

Neutral Citation No: [2021] NIQB 70

Ref: McC11557

*Judgment: approved by the Court for handing down
(subject to editorial corrections)

ICOS:

Delivered: 24/06/2021

IN THE HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE IN NORTHERN IRELAND

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION
(DIVISIONAL COURT)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COUNTY COURT FOR THE DIVISION OF BELFAST

IN THE MATTER OF THE EXTRADITION ACT 2003

BETWEEN:

GINTARAS DUSEVICIUS

Appellant

-v-

THE REPUBLIC OF LITHUANIA

Respondent

Before: McCloskey LJ and McFarland J

Representation

Appellant: Mr Donal Sayers QC and Ms Bobbie-Leigh Herdman, of counsel, instructed by John J Rice Solicitors

Respondent: Mr Tony McGleenan QC and Mr Stephen Ritchie, of counsel, instructed by the Crown Solicitor's Office

INDEX

Paragraph

I.	Overview	1 – 6
II.	The Eleven Cases	7 – 8
III.	The Decisions Under Appeal	9 – 11
IV.	Evidential Matrix	12 – 40
V.	The April 2020 Assurance	41 – 46
VI.	The April 2020 Assurance Construed	47 – 53
VII.	The November 2020 Assurances	54 – 57

VIII.	This Court's Request For Further Information	58 – 65
IX.	Legal Framework	66 – 87
X.	The Recent English Decisions	88 – 95
XI.	The First Instance Decision	96 – 100
XII.	The Article 3 ECHR Appeal	101 – 122
XIII.	The Lithuanian Responses Further Scrutinised	123 – 137
XIV.	Our Conclusions	138 – 153
XV.	Order	154
XVI.	Postscript	155 - 159

[Appendices - omitted from this reported version

- 1 Agreed chronology
- 2 The NI Lithuanian Group of Cases
- 3 Schedule of Assurances
- 4 Final Article 15(3) Request for Further Information]

Lexicon

The appellants, Gintaris Dusecivius and Viktoras Michailovas, both nationals of Lithuania: “Mr D” and “Mr M”.

The Respondent and its various emanations are described mainly as “the Lithuanian Government/authorities”.

The following prisons in Lithuania - Alytus, Marijampole and Pravieneskes - are described as ‘A’, ‘M’ and ‘P’ Prisons respectively.

United Kingdom = “UK”.

Action Plan = “AP”.

The Council of Europe Committee for the Prevention of Torture = “CPT”

Crown Prosecution Service: “CPS”

Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union: “the Charter”

Council Framework Decision of 13 June 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedure between member states Date: the “Framework Decision”

Extradition Act 2003: the “2003 Act”

McCLOSKEY LJ (giving the judgment of the court)

Preamble

The hearing of this appeal on 17 February, 19 March and 21 May 2021 was conducted exclusively by remote means. All three parties and their respective three-member legal teams were in attendance by this mechanism. Judgment was delayed by the need to await the requesting state's reply to the court's requests for further information and the parties' consequential further submissions.

I OVERVIEW

[1] The appellants challenge the decision and orders of the County Court for the Division of Belfast dated 27 and 30 November 2020 respectively ordering their extradition to Lithuania. Leave to appeal to this court was refused by the decision of the single judge dated 6 January 2021. The appellants renew their applications for leave. A separate judgment has been delivered in the conjoined appeal, that of Mr Michailovas ("Mr M"): see [2021] NIQB 60. There is an agreed chronology at Appendix 1.

[2] In the court below these two cases eventually formed part of a larger group of 11 cases, all involving Lithuanian nationals and the Lithuanian State. This number grew progressively with the passage of time. As they had certain issues in common these cases were managed and progressed together. The case of Mr D emerged as the lead one, followed by that of Mr M. This judgment is confined to Mr D's appeal.

[3] The litigation history of these two appeals is of particular importance having regard to the consideration that much material evidence has been generated since their inception. This history can be traced by reference to the five successive judgments of Belfast County Court during the period January 2018 to November 2020. Four of these decisions were made in the case of Mr D. The fifth was in the case of Mr M. It is common case that the Article 3 ECHR issue applies without distinction to both appeals and others in the broader group.

[4] While the proceedings have become somewhat protracted it is clear that the several individual segments of delay and related complexities, coupled with the progressively large number of cases, combined to pose challenges with which the first instance judge has dealt admirably.

[5] At this stage judgment at first instance has been given in these two cases only. The generic issue linking all 11 cases is whether their extradition to Lithuania would violate the requested persons' rights under Article 3 ECHR/Article 4 CFR by exposing them to a real risk of inhuman treatment by reason of prison conditions in Lithuania, in contravention of section 21 of the Extradition Act 2003 (the "2003 Act") and also section 6 of the Human Rights Act 1998. Her Honour Judge Smyth resolved this issue in favour of the Lithuanian State. This court is, in substance, invited to conclude that the judge erred in law in doing so.

[6] The generic issue outlined above is to be distinguished from other issues specific to individual cases. Thus, as the two conjoined appeals demonstrate and by illustration only, any Article 8 ECHR ground of appeal will inevitably be fact specific in nature. Such an issue has arisen in the case of Mr M only.

II THE ELEVEN CASES

[7] There is a useful table, provided by the Respondent State at the court's request, reproduced at Appendix 2. It details, as regards each of the 11 requested persons concerned, the date of the EAW, the date of their arrests, the nature of the EAW and, finally, the offence/s of which each requested person has been convicted or is suspected. The cases of Mr M and Mr D belong to this group. It is understood by this court that Belfast County Court has deferred final determination of the other nine cases pending the decision of this court in these conjoined appeals.

[8] As appears from the table, some of these warrants are of disturbing vintage. Almost half are of more than four years vintage. In every case the requested person has been arrested. The oldest arrests occurred in September 2016 and the more recent (that of Mr M) in September 2019. These observations take their colour from one of the principles underpinning the Framework Decision, namely the principle of expedition, discussed later in this judgment.

III THE DECISIONS UNDER APPEAL

[9] Mr D. By the decision and order of the County Court for the Division of Belfast dated 30 November 2020 the court acceded to the request of the Lithuanian State for the surrender of this appellant pursuant to a EAW dated 27 October 2015 in respect of charges of eight alleged offences of theft and criminal damage said to have been committed in 2013. This case, therefore, involves a so-called “accusation warrant”. While Mr D had also been the subject of an earlier “conviction warrant” dated 28 February 2014, following execution he served his sentence and this is of no enduring relevance, a formal discharge order of Belfast County Court having been ultimately made. Both EAWs were executed on the same date, 12 June 2017, following which Mr D served his “Lithuanian sentence” in respect of the first EAW.

[10] Mr M. We record the outline of his case for comparison purposes. By the decision and order of the District Judge of the City of Westminster Magistrates’ Court, dated 13 February 2013, Mr M was discharged in respect of the first EAW in his case. This was based on the judge’s assessment that the EAW was invalid as it had not been issued by a judicial authority, contrary to section 2(2) of the 2003 Act. An ensuing out of time appeal by the Lithuanian State was dismissed by order of the High Court dated 22 April 2013. A phase of apparent inertia during the period April 2013 to September 2016 then intervened. Next the second (operative) EAW materialised, on 30 September 2016. Pursuant thereto, Mr M was arrested over three years later, on 12 December 2019. Mr M has been in custody ever since.

[11] The request of the State of Lithuania for the surrender of Mr M pursuant to the second EAW is in respect of a sentence of 3½ years’ imprisonment imposed on 15 January 2010 following his conviction of the offence of possession of narcotic substances for the purpose of supply, committed on 5 May 2008. The operative warrant is of some 4 ½ years vintage.

IV THE EVIDENTIAL MATRIX

[12] One distinctive feature of the evidential matrix of both cases is that a substantial quantity of material evidence has been generated since the execution of the EAWs in both cases. An outline of this matrix in chronological sequence is essential for the purpose of identifying the issues before this court. The theme of so-called “assurances” is a recurring feature of both the evidence and the relevant jurisprudence. The parties’ agreed chronology of relevant assurances is reproduced in Appendix 3.

[13] The evidential matrix is constituted firstly by certain reports of the European Committee for the Prevention of Torture and Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (the “CPT”), an organ of the Council of Europe. These reports provided the stimulus for another important corpus of evidence, namely the formal requests devised by Belfast County Court from time to time and the response thereto of the Lithuanian State. In the evidence before this court the first milestone in the chronology is the inspection of certain Lithuanian prisons by a CPT delegation in 2012: see [14] infra. However, the history is more extensive, as will become apparent from our consideration of the cases of Mironovas and Others v Lithuania in [77] – [83] infra.

[14] The first of the CPT reports in the evidence before this court was published on 4 June 2014. It was based on an inspection of four Lithuanian prisons carried out by CPT members in November/December 2012. The report identified a series of shortcomings and concerns relating to the ill treatment of prisoners, access to a lawyer, health care screening of newly detained persons, conditions of detention (in multiple respects), overcrowding, health care services, the prevention, treatment and transmission of HIV in one particular prison (“A”), the adequacy of staffing and the availability of facilities for phone calls, visits and making complaints.

[15] The response of the Lithuanian Government to the first CPT report was published on the same date. This consisted of a detailed reply to all of the recommendations and requests for information of the CPT. This details inter alia certain completed reactive steps, some works in progress and other measures at the planning stage. It also highlights various provisions of domestic Lithuanian law such as the Code on Enforcement of Penal Sanctions and Law of Detention. It also describes works of renovation and modernisation of parts of the prison establishments inspected.

[16] The second main contributor to the evidential matrix is a series of letters from the Lithuanian Government (usually through its Ministry of Justice) to the appropriate agencies in England and Wales (usually the Crown Prosecution Service – “CPS”) and Belfast County Court. The first of these is dated 22 August 2016. It is couched in general terms, befitting a response to a general enquiry evidently made in the context of a specific case before Westminster Magistrates’ Court. This letter is properly characterised as defensive and evasive. It resolves to a central, unparticularised assertion, evidently a repetition of what had been stated in previous letters, that “... the detention conditions in Lithuania meet the minimum international standards”. When one takes into account that this letter was written one month before the second CPT inspection of Lithuanian prisons giving rise to the second of the CPT reports containing a host of findings of unacceptable conditions, practices and arrangements, the general claim which it enshrines appears manifestly unsustainable. The same claim was repeated in a further letter, dated 1 September 2016, to the CPS.

[17] The first decision of Belfast County Court is dated 8 January 2018. The stimulus for this was the execution of the operative EAW in the case of Mr D (on 12 June 2017). At this stage Mr D's case was the one which the court was apparently most actively seized at that stage. The judge recorded at [5]:

"The sole bar to extradition relied upon is that the prison conditions to which the defendant would be exposed in Lithuania would give rise to a real risk of inhumane and degrading treatment contrary to Article 3 ECHR."

The court held that there was a real risk in the foregoing terms and ruled that "... further enquiries will now be made regarding the conditions in which it is envisaged that the Defendant will be detained in order to ensure that his Article 3 rights will be safeguarded", effectively staying the proceedings. In thus ruling the court considered that it was acting in accordance with the decision of the Grand Chamber of the CJEU in Re Aranyosi [2016] 3 CMLR 13 (infra).

[18] The response of the Lithuanian Government to the request of Belfast County Court for certain "specific assurances" is contained in a letter dated 29 January 2018 from the Prosecutor General's Office. This states that in the event of Mr D being detained during the pre-trial investigation phase he would be held at "K" prison. As regards conditions of detention - cell size, lighting, temperature, ventilation, nutrition and maximum permitted prison population (336) - the letter simply refers to the relevant requirements of domestic Lithuanian law. In a further response dated 5 February 2018 there is a general, unparticularised assertion that -

"... the conditions of Lithuanian prisons (both remand prisons and correctional institutions) meet at least minimal [sic] international standards."

This was supplemented by a second letter, dated 5 February 2018, from the Ministry of Justice. This stated that it was not possible to indicate the penal institution in which Mr D would be accommodated if convicted. This letter contradicted its predecessor of 29 January 2018 by making the same statement relating to Mr D's pre-trial remand detention. Finally, it claimed that all prisoners in Lithuania enjoyed "living space" which was "close to or exceeds 4 square metres."

[19] A further inspection of certain Lithuanian prisons by CPT members in September 2016 gave rise to the publication of a second report on 1 February 2018 (a month after the first of the four judgments of Belfast County Court). This report records that it was compiled following the fifth periodic visit of a CPT delegation to Lithuania. The institutions visited included the "A" and "M" Prisons noted at the outset of this judgment.

[20] The findings and assessments of the delegation, as expressed in the report, included in particular the following: no continuing concerns of substance relating to the ill treatment of prisoners; enduring shortcomings in access to a lawyer and a doctor; inadequate minimum standards of living space per adult sentenced prisoner; allegations of ill treatment and excessive physical force by prison officers in “A” and “M” Prisons; escalating inter-prisoner violence at the same prisons; a continuing need for modernisation of prisons; an absence of programmes and meaningful activities for more than half of sentenced prisoners; continuing inadequate health care facilities; an escalation in illicit drug consumption; the absence of a multi-disciplinary programme for the prevention of transmissible diseases; inadequate staffing levels; an improvement in prison visits and telephone facilities; and unacceptable material conditions in several disciplinary cells. The report also contains the delegation’s findings from a renewed visit to a psychiatric hospital, a first visit to a mental health centre and a first visit to a social care facility.

[21] The response of the Lithuanian government to the second CPT report was published on the same date, 1 February 2018. Once again this took the form of a point by point reply. This detailed a series of measures which, variously, consisted of the completed, the continuing and the foreseen or planned. This response also purported to reply to a series of specific CPT requests for information. It also documents certain contemplated changes in specified Lithuanian laws. These included, for example, a project examining alternatives to custodial sentences. It claimed that in accordance with a new programme the Lithuanian prison estate would complete a major overhaul by 2022, when there would be six modern penitentiary institutions consisting of four newly constructed prisons and the partial reconstruction of “A” and “M” Prisons. The reply further asserted that since 2010 the number of convicted prisoners had been reduced by 28% and the number of remand prisoners had decreased by 55%. This had a bearing on several of the expressed CPT concerns – prison overcrowding, cell size, inter-prisoner violence, the supervision of prisoners and staffing levels among others.

[22] Chronologically, the next development was a letter dated 10 March 2018 from the Lithuanian Prosecutor General’s Office directed (though not addressed) to Belfast County Court. This was stimulated by a further request for information, evidently approved by the court, in the wake of the two earlier Lithuanian responses noted in [18] above. Properly analysed this contains only one concrete statement, namely (contradicting the second of the earlier letters) that Mr D would be detained in Kaunas Remand Prison pre-trial.

[23] This prompted a further request for information from Belfast County Court dated 27 March 2018. This comprised 12 specific questions, compiled initially by the legal representatives of Mr D. The Lithuanian Ministry of Justice reply dated 13 April 2018 contains the following assertions: in the three named remand prisons detainees enjoy a minimum of 3.6 square metres of personal living space; as a result of the introduction of alternatives to imprisonment, the convicted prisoner population in Lithuania was decreasing; there was no extant overcrowding in Lithuanian remand prisons and no risk of this occurring; an acknowledged “problem” of failing to re-distribute detainees within all remand prisons in order to counter overcrowding had been “already eliminated”; and (in substance) overcrowding had not been a problem in any type of Lithuanian prison since 2015.

[24] From its third (June 2019) report (infra) it emerges that the CPT delegation, having completed its further visit between 20 and 27 April 2018, (which, notably, was unannounced) made an “urgent request” of the Lithuanian authorities by a letter dated 4 May 2018 containing the delegation’s preliminary observations. This requested the Lithuanian authorities –

“... to provide ... within three months ... a detailed action plan, comprising precise deadlines and an indication of the responsible organs and the required financial and human resources, to fight against drug trafficking in prison, inter-prisoner violence and the power of informal prisoner hierarchies and to address the problem of the spread of HIV and Hepatitis C in prisons.”

[25] On 27 September 2018 the Lithuanian Minister of Justice formally approved the following:

“ACTION PLAN ON IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS PROVIDED BY THE [CPT] AFTER ITS VISIT TO LITHUANIA IN [sic] 20–27 APRIL 2018”.

The “Action Plan” (“AP”) was attached to a letter sent by the Lithuanian Ministry of Justice to the CPS the following month. This unfolded in the context of an exchange of correspondence between these two agencies (which, in the evidence before this court, may be incomplete). This letter is of some importance. It is a response to a CPS request for “provision of guarantee”. It states without equivocation that “... the requested assurances and/or guarantees cannot be provided ...”. It is clear that the terms of the latter were that all surrendered persons “... will not be accommodated in the cells which include the possibility of contact with inmates accommodated in dormitory blocks of [the A, M and P Prisons]”. It describes these three prisons as “the main establishments for placement of sentenced adult males”. It explains:

“Provision of the requested assurances and/or guarantees would lead us to have no place for accommodation of persons surrendered to the Republic of Lithuania from the United Kingdom on the grounds of the European Arrest Warrant in future.”

The letter then repeats the previously provided assurance that all such surrendered persons “... will be guaranteed a minimum space allocation of no less than 3 square metres per person ...”.

[26] The AP of 27 September 2018 followed. This is a seven-page document consisting of seven columns per page namely:

- (i) Title of task/action.
- (ii) Aim of action.
- (iii) Description of action.
- (iv) Deadline of implementation.
- (v) Budget allocated for implementation of the task.
- (vi) Institutions responsible for implementation of the task.
- (vii) Implementation.

As noted above the Lithuanian authorities had previously received the “preliminary observations” of the CPT delegation and its letter of 4 May 2018 containing a “urgent request”, both arising out of the visit in April 2018 culminating in the third and final CPT report (subsequently published on 25 June 2019: infra).

[27] Bearing in mind the contours of the appellants’ Article 3 ECHR challenge, and the court having considered the AP in full, it suffices to highlight the following aspects of this superficially impressive document:

- (i) It detailed a total of 15 measures – a mixture of the practical, administrative and legislative – to be taken. While on the face of the document all of the measures were assigned to future implementation, it is evident from earlier evidence that some of them – for example, reduction in the prison population, were continuing in nature.
- (ii) Approximately half of the proposed measures were identified as requiring no additional budget.
- (iii) The total financial expenditure projected was circa €80 million. Around one half of this would be consumed by the construction of a new remand prison (at Siauliai).
- (iv) While projected expenditure of €1.7 million was identified in respect of the discrete task of increasing preventive measures regarding dangerous transmissible diseases, the “Implementation” column stated:

“As no additional budget was allocated and current funds are insufficient to significantly increase the scale of HIV treatment and Hepatitis C screening and treatment, the implementation of this measure is not possible. Currently, approximately 53% of patients receive HIV related treatment. HIV treatment and Hepatitis C screening and treatment are prescribed considering the medical indications.”

We shall at [37] infra juxtapose this passage with what was later stated by the Lithuanian Ministry of Justice in a letter of October 2019 to the CPS.

[28] To complete the chronology in respect of the year 2018, in summary:

- (i) There was a letter of 21 June 2018 and attachment emanating from the Lithuanian Prosecutor General’s Office and the Ministry of Justice containing a generalised assurance of compliance with Article 3 ECHR in relation to all persons surrendered from the United Kingdom.
- (ii) A further letter dated 26 June 2018 from the Lithuanian Ministry of Justice, one of a collection of several documents bearing this date, asserted that everyone detained in Siauliai Remand Prison enjoyed “average living space” of four square metres.
- (iii) By a further letter dated 26 June 2018 the Prosecutor General’s Office provided data of EAWs issued and persons surrendered in respect of the period 2015 to June 2018. This letter repeatedly employed the terminology of EAWs issued “for the purpose of criminal prosecution” (see chapter VI infra of this judgment).
- (iv) Next, by its letter dated 13 August 2018 directed to Belfast County Court the Lithuanian Ministry of Justice reiterated:

“... All persons surrendered to the Republic of Lithuania from the United Kingdom under the European Arrest Warrant for the purpose of execution of sentences will be detained in correctional institutions where detention conditions are in conformity with the provisions of Article 3 of the Convention ...”.

- (v) This is to be considered in conjunction with a contemporaneous letter of 7 August 2018 addressed to the CPS, which states:

“1. All persons surrendered under an accusation warrant from the United Kingdom will be held in [K, L or S] remand prison, whereby they will be guaranteed a minimum space allocation of no less than 3 metres per person in accordance with Article 3 [ECHR]”.

2. Persons surrendered under a conviction warrant that may spend a maximum of 10 days at one of the remand centres set out in clause 1 will be subject to the same guarantees
3. All persons held in [L or S] ... will only be held in the refurbished parts or renovated parts of the prisons and in compliance with Article 3 ...”.

We have highlighted the words “no less than 3 metres per person” for the purpose of comparing and contrasting this with other communications from the Lithuanian Government considered above. This was followed by another letter from the Lithuanian authorities to Belfast County Court, dated 13 August 2018. This mentions, but does not enclose, the AP and describes certain improvements in prison conditions, some completed and others a work in progress.

[29] The next development was the second judgment of Belfast County Court on 25 March 2019. The judge considered inter alia the evidence noted immediately above, together with the second CPT report. The judge also noted the available expert evidence. In a key passage the judge stated at [35]:

“The situation in respect of Mr [D] is that the specific questions posed by this court have not been answered by the requesting state. The response is general, makes no mention of the allocation rules or the specific issues arising out of the expert report or my judgment and provides no information as to the likely prison in which he will be held either on remand, or upon conviction. Furthermore, the court now has the benefit of the 2018 CPT report.

The court determined that specific assurances would be sought of the Lithuanian authorities having regard to “.... issues regarding overcrowding caused by the allocation rules, inadequate medical facilities and programmes resulting in contraction of HIV, serious inter-prisoner violence in the absence of proper supervision and the inappropriate use of restraint beds ...”, all of which the court considered to generate a real risk of violating Article 3 ECHR.

[30] The specific assurances sought were threefold, in these terms:

“In light of the concerning information, the following specific assurances are necessary to ensure the protection of the requested person’s article 3 rights:

- He will not be detained at any time in Alytus and Marijampole Prisons. Although the good faith of the requesting state is acknowledged, as are efforts and plans for improvement, until such time as these improvements are completed assurances are necessary particularly against the background of earlier, unreliable assurances having been given.
- Furthermore, in respect of Lukiskes, the court requires a guarantee that those extradited will be held only in the refurbished parts of the prison (as guaranteed in Guy Jane).
- The requested person will not be held in cells containing restraint beds in Lukiskes, Panevezys and Kaunas Prisons."

In thus determining the judge observed:

".... There is ample evidence that general guarantees regarding prison conditions have been shown to be unreliable and the 2018 CPT report indicates deterioration rather than improvement in a number of respects."

[31] The Lithuanian Vice-Minister of Justice replied by letter dated 17 April 2019. This letter does not engage with the judge's request for an assurance in respect of A and M prisons. Nor does it engage with the second of the court's requests, whereby an assurance in respect of L Prison was sought. As regards the third request for an assurance in respect of three specified prisons the letter replied in general terms that restraint beds "... could be applied only in exceptional cases" The letter contained what it describes as (the repeated) "general guarantee" of Art 3 ECHR compliance.

[32] Next, according to the third of the five judgments of Belfast County Court, there was what the judge described as a "final hearing" in May 2019. There are no details of this hearing in the voluminous materials before this court. The parties are agreed that this event occurred on 25 October 2019, followed by the third (of five) judgment on 14 November 2019. We return to this discrete subplot in [38] infra.

[33] On 25 June 2019 the CPT published its third and final report, based on a further inspection of certain Lithuanian detention facilities between 20 and 27 April 2018, evidently on an unannounced basis. The report records, in general terms, that many of the previous recommendations had not been implemented. It noted the receipt of an unspecified number of "credible" allegations of physical ill treatment at A, M and P Prisons "... in the context of staff interventions to stop inter-prisoner violence". There were also numerous allegations of the mass physical ill treatment of prisoners during a general search of 'A' Prison punishment block on a specific date,

5 July 2017. The ensuing investigation was not considered effective. No prosecutions ensued. The delegation observed “truly extraordinary levels of inter-prisoner violence, intimidation and exploitation” at the A, M and P prisons, conveying the “strong impression” that the main detention areas in these prisons were out of control.

[34] The report noted that while works of reconstruction and refurbishment in prisons were a mixture of the partly completed and continuing, overcrowded large capacity dormitories remained; remand prisoners were still locked up for up to 23 hours daily; under-resourcing of health care facilities continued; the system of recording prisoners’ injuries remained “poor”; drugs remained omnipresent in the prisons; the transmission of HIV and Hepatitis C continued; and staffing levels remained very low. The report described in general terms “a number of serious and urgent concerns in Lithuania’s penitentiary establishments”. It noted that an “Action Plan” had been provided “.... to combat drug trafficking in prisons, inter-prisoner violence and to address the problem of the spread of HIV and Hepatitis C in prisons”. The CPT observed that if properly and energetically implemented this “could help address” some of the serious and urgent concerns assessed.

[35] Chronologically, the next development consisted of a letter dated 8 July 2019 from the Lithuanian “Prison Department under the Ministry of Justice” to the CPS. Under the rubric “Provision of Guarantee” the author stated that the Director General of his department –

“... hereby assures and guarantees that the below stated conditions will be applied to all persons surrendered for the purpose of a criminal prosecution or execution of a sentence of imprisonment during their detention.”

The five specific guarantees which follow are a minimum cell space of no less than three square metres per person, that any sentenced surrendered persons would not be detained at any of the unrenovated parts of A, M or P Prisons, that all surrendered persons “... will be detained in conditions reducing a risk to [sic] inter-prisoner violence/disease transfer and drug influences”, that all such persons “... will be guaranteed the protections of the [ECHR]” and that they “... will be housed in cell-type accommodation, where possible”. This letter further asserted that the M and P Prisons each had a renovated block, with specified capacities, dating from 2016 and 2018 respectively.

[36] The main thrust of the second of the next Lithuanian Government communication, that dated 16 August 2019, was that the assurances and guarantees requested by the CPS could not be provided. The assurance which had been requested was that all surrendered persons –

“... will not be accommodated in the cells which include the possibility of contact with inmates accommodated in dormitory blocks of (A, M and P Prisons).”

The reasons proffered for the Lithuanian Government's inability to provide the assurance requested were that these three prisons are "the main establishments for placement of sentenced adult males" and that dormitory type blocks must be utilised by reason of the capacity of the three prisons and the numbers of sentenced prisoners.

[37] The third of the 2019 trilogy of communications is dated 17 October 2019. It purports to be a response to a request for further information, evidently made by the CPS. This contains a series of representations relating to facilities for prisoners' complaints, prisoners' requests for isolation, the prevalence of inter-prisoner violence, sanctions for such violence, attempts to reduce drug consumption by prisoners, drug treatment and educational measures and, finally, the use of segregation as a sanction. This letter further addresses the discrete issue of the transmission of communicable diseases, in the form of three statements. First, there is preventive screening and, where required, timely medical treatment is provided, together with educational activities. Second:

"Since Spring of 2018, all HIV infected persons are subject to HIV treatment and since May 2019 all persons ill with serious communicable diseases are included in the national health system, i.e. their medical treatment is financed with the Compulsory Health Insurance Funds."

This is to be compared with what was stated in the AP on this subject: see [27] supra.

[38] Chronologically, the next material development was the third of the judgments of Belfast County Court, dated 14 November 2019. The judgment of Her Honour makes specific reference to the first of the three aforementioned documents only. The judge acceded to the application on behalf of the Lithuanian State to adjourn the proceedings on the ground that a relevant decision of the English Administrative Court in a series of conjoined appeals was pending. This decision was promulgated soon thereafter, on 20 December 2019: see Bartulis v Lithuania [2019] EWHC 3504 (Admin).

[39] This was followed by:

- (i) The arrest of Mr M on 12 December 2019 pursuant to the EAW.
- (ii) The decision in Bartulis and Others v Lithuania [2019] EWHC 3504 (Admin) on 20 December 2019.
- (iii) A further letter from Belfast County Court dated 18 February 2020 requesting the following information: whether there had been any complaint that Lithuania had breached any assurance given to any EU Member State; specified particulars of any such breaches; the number of people surrendered to Lithuania and any EU Member State's refusal to extradite to Lithuania on account of Article 3 ECHR non-compliant prison conditions.

- (iv) The response of the Lithuanian State dated 7 February 2020, stating that there had been two refusals, one in a Maltese case in July 2017 and the other in Lithuania v Campbell [2013] NIQB 19. The letter asserts, in terms, that each of these cases had been overtaken by more recent events. It further suggested that according to a published EU tool of measurement Lithuanian prisons were not overcrowded.

[40] It is convenient to outline, before considering, the other main milestones of the year 2020. These were, sequentially:

- (i) The so-called “Covid caveat” letter of 3 April 2020.
- (ii) The decision in Gerulskis and Others v Lithuania [2020] EWHC 1645 (Admin), on 26 June 2020.
- (iii) The two judgments and orders of Belfast County Court, of 27 November 2020 and 30 November 2020.

V THE APRIL 2020 LITHUANIAN ASSURANCE

[41] This is a discrete topic of some importance which requires to be rehearsed in appropriate detail. It concerns a letter dated 3 April 2020 from the Director General of the Prison Department of the Lithuanian Ministry of Justice to the CPS. It is apparent on its face that this letter does not form part of a course of correspondence. It is properly described as unsolicited. The previous letter emanating from this agency was that dated 17 October 2019, noted above.

[42] This is a single communication consisting of two parts, namely a letter and an attachment. The subject matter of the letter is “Guarantees Applicable to Persons Surrendered from the UK to Lithuania under EAW.” The introductory paragraph of the letter states that by reason of the Covid pandemic “... the management of Lithuanian correctional system could be encumbered in the nearly [sic] future.” The next two paragraphs describe the consequences of the foregoing:

“Thus avoiding any infringements of the guarantees of 07 August 2018 and 08 July 2019 which regards [sic] specific detention conditions for the persons surrendered to the Republic of Lithuania from the United Kingdom on the grounds of the [EAW]. We have to notify you that above mentioned guarantees will not be further applied from the moment of signing this letter ...

In order to ensure resultative process of surrender cases in the judicial institutions of the United Kingdom, please find a new guarantee, prescribing specific conditions which will be applied for the persons surrendered to the Republic of Lithuania from the United Kingdom on the grounds of the EAW for the purpose of a criminal prosecution. Please note that this guarantee will not be revoked (if necessary) without informing the Crown Prosecution Service in written form."

[our highlighting]

We shall address the significance of the highlighted words infra.

[43] The document attached to the letter bears the same date and is also addressed to the CPS. It begins:

"The Director General of the Prison Department under the Ministry of Justice for the Republic of Lithuania hereby assures and guarantees that the below stated conditions will be applied to all persons surrendered to the Republic of Lithuania from the United Kingdom on the grounds of the [EAW] for the purpose of a criminal prosecution during their detention: ..."
[Our emphasis.]

This is followed by three numbered guarantees:

1. All persons surrendered from the United Kingdom will be guaranteed a minimum space allocation of no less than 3 square metres per person and held in compliance with Article 3 [ECHR].
2. All persons concerned in the United Kingdom, if held in the Siauliai Remand Prison, will only be held in the refurbished or renovated parts of the prison and in compliance with Article 3 [ECHR].
3. All persons surrendered from the United Kingdom, if convicted, that may spend a maximum of 10 days at Siauliai Remand Prison will be subject to the same guarantees as contained in clause 1 and 2.

We also draw to your attention that due to the quarantine regime introduced by the decision of the Government of the Republic of Lithuania, in the view of the danger caused by the spread of COVID-19 disease, the work of Lithuanian institutions is encumbered, which might have impact on the implementation of the assurance."

[44] From a careful reading of the letter and enclosure as a whole and noting in particular the language of the third paragraph of the letter, we consider it reasonably clear that its main impetus was an assessment of the Lithuanian Ministry of Justice that by reason of the recently materialised Covid circumstances infringements of the August 2018 and July 2019 guarantees were foreseen. What specific guarantees were hereby being modified or rescinded?

[45] To answer this it is necessary to recall the contents of the two communications in question:

- (i) The “Provision of Guarantee” letter dated 7 August 2018 contains the threefold “assurances and guarantees” that (a) all “accusation warrant” surrendered persons would be detained in one of two named remand prisons (one being Siauliai) with a guaranteed minimum space allocation of 3 square metres, (b) all persons surrendered under a “conviction warrant” could be detained at one of the same remand facilities for a maximum period of ten days with the same minimum space allocation and (c) all surrendered persons held in either of the said remand facilities “... will only be held in the refurbished or renovated parts of the prisons and in compliance with Article 3 [ECHR].”
- (ii) The second of the two communications under scrutiny is also a “Provision of Guarantee” letter, dated 8 July 2019. This is another apparently unprompted letter. Like its predecessor it applies to both types of EAW. It contains five “assurances and guarantees”. One of these simply repeats the minimum cell space assurance. It also contains a generalised assurance of providing the ECHR protections. It embodies three new assurances/guarantees viz all surrendered persons (a) would be detained in “conditions reducing a risk to [sic] inter-prisoner violence/disease transfer and drug influences” (b) would be “housed in cell-type accommodation, where possible” and (c) would not be accommodated in any of the unrenovated blocks of the A, M or P prisons.

[46] The immediately preceding exercise yields the analysis that in its later communication of 3 April 2020 the Lithuanian Government was continuing to offer the earlier assurances provided relating to minimum cell space and being accommodated in renovated prison wings only. In short, only two of the previous assurances were being maintained. The rescinded assurances were those relating to the exclusion of the unrenovated blocks at the A, M and P Prisons, detention in conditions reducing the risk of inter-prisoner violence, the transmission of diseases and drug influences and detention in cell-type accommodation where possible.

VI THE APRIL 2020 ASSURANCE CONSTRUED

[47] We shall at this juncture identify a key issue. One of the important questions thrown up by the Lithuanian letter of 3 April 2020 and attachment is whether it applies to the entire cohort of persons surrendered to Lithuania from the United Kingdom pursuant to an executed EAW i.e. to both the “accusation warrant” group and the “conviction warrant” group. As already noted the case of Mr D belongs to the former group whereas that of Mr M is a member of the latter group.

[48] The title of the letter of 3 April 2020 makes no distinction between the two groups. However, in the body of the letter the language employed is “persons surrendered ... for the purpose of a criminal prosecution” (our emphasis). This language is repeated verbatim in the attachment. This consistent thread is continued in the language of the second of the three new assurances, which relates exclusively to a remand prison (Siauliai). We consider that consistency is also discernible in the third of the three new assurances which, construed in plain and unsophisticated terms, simply means that a surrendered person under an accusation warrant who is later convicted will continue to enjoy the benefit of the first and second of the new assurances for up to ten further days. The reason for this is, as the letter states, that such persons may continue to be detained post-trial at the Siauliai Remand Prison during this maximum period.

[49] To summarise, within the text of the letter and its attachment there are several strong pointers to the assessment that the three new guarantees, which of course replace all previous guarantees, relate to surrendered persons who become remand detainees only. The first is the unequivocal language of the text. The second is that the only detention facility identified is of the remand type. The third is that there is no mention, express or implied, of any of the Lithuanian prisons which accommodate convicted persons.

[50] The next pointer to this being the correct assessment is the liberal references to the A, M and P Prisons in earlier communications from the Lithuanian authorities. It is apparent from these communications that these are the three main detention facilities for convicted persons in Lithuania. Linked to this is another, namely the unambiguous statement in the Ministry of Justice letter of 16 August 2019 to the CPS – noted in [36] above – that “convicted persons”, including those surrendered by the United Kingdom, are, in their totality, exposed to the possibility of being accommodated in dormitories. Explicitly, the assurance which could not be provided was that all surrendered persons would be accommodated in conditions excluding the possibility of contact with prisoners accommodated in the dormitory blocks of these three named facilities.

[51] There is a further indicator of the correctness of the court’s suggested construction of the letter of 3 April 2020 and attachment. As our rehearsal of the history above demonstrates, the letters from the Lithuanian authorities throughout the period under scrutiny consistently made a clear distinction between remand prisoners (i.e. accusation warrants – “detainees”) and convicted prisoners (i.e. conviction warrants – “inmates”). The phrase “for the purpose of criminal prosecution” is repeated. Other phraseology such as “pre-trial detention suspected of committing a crime ... [and] ... remand prison” is used. Notably, these phrases are used particularly in communications relating to Mr D. These formulations are to be contrasted with “for the purpose of execution of sentences” used repeatedly in the letter dated 13 August 2018 to Belfast County Court – see [28] above – where one finds also the language of “serve his sentence ... [and] ... the type of the committed crime”.

[52] Having reflected on whether there might conceivably be a translation gremlin of some kind, the court is satisfied that this possibility is convincingly defeated by the analysis undertaken and factors highlighted in the preceding paragraphs. To this we would add that the quality of the English translations in the entirety of the documents under scrutiny is consistently high. While in some of the passages quoted we have (by the insertion of “sic”) drawn attention to certain aspects of the text these consist of minor linguistic, syntactical and grammatical errors, none of which renders the individual document unintelligible. To the foregoing we would add that our provisional assessment is not questioned by any expert evidence. Quite the contrary, we consider it reinforced by the two expert reports generated on behalf of the appellant in the County Court proceedings and which we have considered.

[53] Mr McGleenan QC, on behalf of the requesting state, correctly reminded the court that one of the optional courses at our disposal is the transmission of a further request for information to the Lithuanian Government by the invocation of Article 15(2) of the Framework Directive. This confers a power which may be of considerable utility and importance in a given case. In the broader panorama of the history of these appeals it was repeatedly invoked by both Belfast County Court and the English Divisional Court. The qualifying condition is that “...the executing judicial authority finds the information communicated by the issuing Member State to be insufficient to allow it to decide on surrender.”

VII THIS COURT’S REQUEST FOR FURTHER INFORMATION

[54] One of the fundamental human rights is in play. This court’s duty as a public authority under section 6 of the Human Rights Act is engaged. This is an Aranyosi stage two case. Thus the fundamental question for this court is whether the earlier identified risk that this appellant will in the event of his surrender to Lithuania be exposed to inhuman or degrading treatment proscribed by Article 3 EHR has been dispelled by the totality of the communications from the Lithuanian Government to the various UK agencies post-dating January 2018, when the Aranyosi stage 1 assessment, which this court adopts, was made.

[55] Article 15(2) of the Framework Decision is in two parts. The first part requires the court to make an assessment of whether the information provided by the Lithuanian Government, considered in its totality, is sufficient to allow this court to make a decision on the surrender of this appellant pursuant to the EAW. Where the court makes an assessment of insufficiency the effect of the second part of Article 15(2) is to subject the court to a duty to request of the requesting state the “necessary supplementary information”.

[56] We are satisfied about this court’s competence, as an appellate court, to take the course of seeking further information from the Lithuanian authorities. This in our view flows from the language of Article 15 (2) construed purposively in the light of the overarching aims and principles. Alternatively, there is no bar to this course in either the Extradition Act or the Framework Decision and this court has available its inherent jurisdiction. This has been the preferred approach in a number of decided cases, which include FK v Stuttgart State Prosecutor's Office Germany [2017] EWHC 2160, Omylski v Poland [2020] EWHC 836 and Straszewski v District Court in Bydgoszcz, Poland [2017] EWHC 844 (Admin).

[57] This court considered carefully all communications from Lithuanian agencies assembled in the evidence. These are a mixture of responses to requests for specific information and the unsolicited. The quality and coherence of these communications have been variable. Some have been evasive and opaque. Furthermore, viewed panoramically, one can identify gaps and inconsistencies. This court further took into account the vintage of the last such communication, now approaching its first anniversary, the so-called "Covid caveat". This was the subject of lively debate at the main hearing. Both the meaning and currency of this communication are matters of obvious importance. It falls to this court to construe the document, an exercise complicated by the fact that it is a translation from its original language.

[58] The court entertained real reservations concerning the available evidence. This arose particularly out of the successive communications of 28 May 2020 and 9 June 2020 from the Lithuanian Ministry of Justice to the CPS. Each of these communications contains detailed information relating to Siauliai Remand Prison. This is the prison in which, it is said, this appellant would be detained in the event of his surrender, as he would initially have the status of remand prisoner. The first issue arising out of these two communications is that while they make a distinction between "detainees" and "inmates", this is not explained. This is puzzling, given the unequivocal representations that only remand prisoners are detained here. Furthermore, a consideration of the full suite of communications emanating from the Lithuanian Government indicates that "detainees" are the cohort of remand prisoners, while "inmates" are convicted prisoners.

[59] Secondly, the two aforementioned communications make no mention of dormitory accommodation. We raise this discrete question only because of our next query, which arises out of the statement that whereas this prison has a total of 109 cells, it has a total of 452 "places" and was, at the time of writing, accommodating 283 persons. The reconciliation between these last two figures and the total number of cells, which must also take into account the statement that certain cells are closed for refurbishment, is far from clear.

[60] Having regard to the foregoing, our conclusion was that the information to determine these appeals with confidence was insufficient. The court therefore formulated a series of questions/requests addressed to the requesting state. These are reproduced in Appendix 4.

[61] The requesting state's response, dated 13 May 2021, confirmed unequivocally the correctness of our tentative construction of the April 2020 assurances. However, it suffered from a series of shortcomings: see Chapter XIII infra.

VIII THE NOVEMBER 2020 ASSURANCES

[62] As already noted the two final judgments of Belfast County Court were provided on 27 and 30 November 2020 respectively. The preceding judgment, in sequence, was the short ruling of 14 November 2019 acceding to the adjournment application of the requesting state. The “Covid Caveat” letter of course, had materialised at approximately the mid-point of the intervening period. By letter dated 30 June 2020 Belfast County Court made a further “request for information”. As appears from the letter, by this stage the number of requested persons’ cases before the court had swollen to 11. One of the named persons was this appellant. While Mr M was not named, it is evidently common case that this was a simple oversight.

[63] By this letter Judge Smyth sought three specific assurances, namely (i) that the requested persons would not be detained at any time in the ‘A’ and ‘M’ Prisons until the completion of improvements, (ii) that the requested persons, if detained in Lukiskes Remand Prison, would be thus detained only in refurbished accommodation and (iii) that the requested persons would not be held in cells containing restraint beds in three named prisons. The letter then notes the “Covid Caveat”. Next, having quoted in full the final paragraph of the attachment to the letter of 3 April 2020 the letter continues:

“Please state in what respects the work of Lithuanian institutions has been encumbered, is envisaged may be encumbered [and] ...

What impact on the implementation of the assurance given to this court has occurred to date [and] is envisaged may occur.”

This is followed by a reference to a published CPT “Statement of Principles”, dated 20 March 2020, relating to the treatment of detainees in the pandemic circumstances. The letter continues:

“The court would be obliged to have a copy of the account of the concrete measures taken by the Lithuanian authorities in the context of the Coronavirus disease (Covid-19) pandemic in prisons that was requested to be sent to the CPT by 30 April 2020.”

The specific question raised in the remainder of the letter may be disregarded for the purposes of these appeals.

[64] At [8] of her final judgment in the case of this appellant the judge states that the Lithuanian state provided a response dated 19 August 2020. This would appear to be the document dated August 2020 (no specific date) from Kaunas Regional Court addressed to the Lithuanian International Liaison Office. This document has two components. The first describes quarantine measures, apparently in the form of absolute isolation, applied to all detained persons in Lithuania between specified dates in March and June 2020, followed by slightly diluted but nonetheless heavy continuing isolation measures. The second part of the communication relates exclusively to a question raised regarding the treatment of an identified Lithuanian person.

[65] Stated succinctly, this communication (a) barely engages at all with the specific requests concerning Lithuanian prison conditions and (b) contains absolutely no response to the request concerning the CPT statement of principles, both contained in the Belfast County Court communication of 30 June 2020.

IX LEGAL FRAMEWORK

[66] The material provisions of the Extradition Act 2003 (the “2003 Act”) are reproduced in Appendix 3 to the judgment in Mr M’s case. In brief compass:

- (i) A person’s extradition to a category 1 territory is barred by reason of the passage of time if (and only if) it appears that it would be unjust or oppressive to extradite him by reason of the passage of time since the alleged commission of the extradition offence or becoming unlawfully at large: section 14.
- (ii) Where the requested person is unlawfully at large or has not been convicted the court must decide whether the person’s extradition would be compatible with the Convention rights under the Human Rights Act 1998: section 21(1) and section 21A(1)(a).
- (iii) In the case of an accused requested person the court must also decide whether the person’s extradition would be disproportionate taking into account, so far as the court considers it appropriate, any or all of the matters specified in section 21A(3).
- (iv) In the case of an accused requested person the court must order the person’s discharge if it decides that the extradition would not be compatible with the Convention rights and would be disproportionate: section 21A(4).
- (v) Where the court considers that the physical or mental condition of the requested person is such that it would be unjust or oppressive to extradite him, it must either (a) order the person’s discharge or (b) adjourn the extradition hearing until it appears to the court that this is no longer the case: section 25.
- (vi) Section 29 regulates the powers of the High Court in cases where the appellant is the requesting state, challenging the order of the judicial authority discharging the requested person at the extradition hearing. By subsection (5) if this court allows the appeal it must quash the discharge order and remit the case to the lower court with directions.

[67] By Article 15(1) of the Framework Decision the executing judicial authority must decide whether the requested person is to be surrendered. The facility established by Article 15(2) was of particular significance in the proceedings before Belfast County Court. This paragraph provides:

“If the executing judicial authority finds the information communicated by the issuing Member State to be insufficient to allow it to decide on surrender, it shall request that the necessary supplementary information ... be furnished as a matter of urgency and may fix a time limit for the receipt thereof ...”

Article 15(3) also had a role at certain stages of the extensive inter-state communications rehearsed above. This paragraph provides:

“The issuing judicial authority may at any time forward any additional useful information to the executing judicial authority.”

[68] On appeal to this court, the appeal may be allowed only if two specified conditions are satisfied namely that (a) the first instance court ought to have decided a question differently and (b) if it had decided such question in the way it should have done, it would have been required to order the appellant’s discharge: section 27(2) and (3). Alternatively, the court may allow the appeal if the new issue/new evidence conditions in section 27(4) are satisfied.

[69] Thus section 27 establishes two gateways for a successful appeal. The first of these arose in both appeals to this court. The second arose in the appeal of Mr M only.

[70] The Framework Decision has its origins in one of the main objectives enshrined in the TEU namely the creation of an area of freedom, security and justice. Within this general objective there is a series of constituent principles which have featured with regularity in the jurisprudence of the CJEU and the leading United Kingdom cases since the Framework Decision replaced the European Convention on Extradition (1957). The key principles which have been identified are those of a high level of mutual trust and confidence between EU Member States and mutual recognition. Recital (6) of the Preamble to the Framework Decision describes the latter principle as the “cornerstone” of judicial co-operation in criminal matters. Article 1(2) gives effect to this by providing that Member States are in principle obliged to execute an EAW: see, amongst other cases, Melloni v Ministerio Fiscal (Case C-399/11) and Minister for Justice and Equality v Lanigan (Case C-237/15) at [36].

[71] While the duty of a requested state to give effect to the execution and surrender provisions of the Framework Decision is very much the norm, it is not absolute. This is so because of, firstly, recital (10) in the Preamble which states that the implementation of the EAW mechanism is capable of being suspended, but only in the event of serious and persistent breach by one of the Member States of the principles enshrined in Article 2 EU and in accordance with the procedure prescribed in Article 7 EU. Furthermore, the jurisprudence of the CJEU has recognised that limitations to the principles of mutual recognition and mutual trust and confidence may be appropriate in “exceptional circumstances”: See Opinion 2/13 (EU:C:2014:2454) at [191]. The Charter of Fundamental Rights of the EU (the “Charter”) is another limiting measure. Article 1(3) of the Framework Decision provides, in substance, that its procedures and arrangements operate in the context of the unmodified obligation of Member States to respect fundamental rights contained in inter alia the Charter.

[72] The interaction between the governing principles and the aforementioned limitations was addressed by the CJEU in its landmark decision in Criminal Proceedings against Aranyosi and Caldaru (Joined Cases C-404/15 and C-659/15 PPU) (“Aranyosi”). The essential question raised in these combined preliminary references was the duty of the requested state in a case where there is evidence that detention conditions in the requesting state are incompatible with fundamental rights, in particular Article 4 of the Charter (the analogue of Article 3 ECHR).

[73] The following are the main tenets of the decision of the Grand Chamber:

- (i) There is, in substance, a presumption that all Member States comply with EU law and particularly the fundamental rights recognised by EU law, save in exceptional circumstances: see [78] and [82].
- (ii) There is a “binding” obligation on Member States to comply with the “absolute” provisions of Article 4 of the Charter: [84] – [85].
- (iii) “It follows that, where the judicial authority of the executing Member State is in possession of evidence of a real risk of inhuman or degrading treatment of individuals detained in the issuing Member State ... [it] is bound to assess the existence of that risk when it is called upon to decide on the surrender to the authorities of the issuing Member State of the individual sought by a European Arrest Warrant” [88].
- (iv) Where there is such evidence, the first task of the executing judicial authority is to consider “information that is objective, reliable, specific and properly updated” on the detention conditions prevailing in the requesting state: [89].
- (v) If, having performed this task, the executing judicial authority finds that there is a real risk in the foregoing terms, this cannot per se warrant a refusal to surrender the requested person: [91].

- (vi) Rather, where such a finding is made, a second task for the executing judicial authority crystallises, namely to make “a further assessment, specific and precise, of whether there are substantial grounds to believe that the individual concerned will be exposed to that risk because of the conditions for his detention envisaged in the issuing Member State”: [92] – [94].
- (vii) In performing this second task, the executing judicial authority “must” invoke Article 15(2) by requesting of the requesting state the provision of “all necessary supplementary information on the conditions in which it is envisaged that the individual concerned will be detained in that Member State”: [95] – [97].
- (viii) “If, in the light of the information provided pursuant to Article 15(2) ... and any other information that may be available to the executing judicial authority, that authority finds that there exists, for the individual (concerned) a real risk of inhuman or degrading treatment ... the execution of that warrant must be postponed but it cannot be abandoned”: [98].
- (ix) At this stage, two possibilities arise. First, where the executing judicial authority, having considered all available information, discounts the existence of a real risk of a violation of Article 4 it must make a surrender decision: [103]. Second, “if the existence of that risk cannot be discounted within a reasonable time, the executing judicial authority must decide whether the surrender procedure should be brought to an end”: [104].

[74] As the judgment in Aranyosi demonstrates, there is a fusion of Article 4 of the Charter and Article 3 ECHR and, in substance, an adoption by the Grand Chamber of the Article 3 tests and principles which have been developed in the jurisprudence of the ECtHR. This observation is apposite having regard to the decision of the latter court in Othman v United Kingdom [2012] 55 EHRR 1. One of the issues which arose in that case, which concerned the proposed deportation of the applicant to Jordan for the purpose of being tried for alleged terrorist offenses, was whether this would infringe his rights under Article 3 ECHR. This entailed consideration of the “Soering” test namely whether there was sufficient evidence of a cogent nature to establish substantial grounds for believing that the applicant would be at real risk of being subjected to treatment proscribed by Article 3 (Soering v United Kingdom [1989] 11 EHRR 439). Where such a risk is demonstrated, an implied obligation arises under Article 3 not to deport the person concerned. Furthermore, given the absolute prohibition enshrined in Article 3, the reasons advanced for the expulsion are immaterial. In Othman the Strasbourg Court observed, at [186], that in cases where the requested state seeks and receives assurances from the requesting state, the task of the court is “... to examine whether the assurances obtained in a particular case are sufficient to remove any real risk of ill treatment”. The court elaborated at [187]:

“In any examination of whether an applicant faces a real risk of ill treatment in the country to which he is to be removed the Court will consider both the general human rights situation in that country and the particular characteristics of the applicant. In a case where assurances have been provided by the receiving State, those assurances constitute a further relevant factor which the Court will consider. However, assurances are not in themselves sufficient to ensure adequate protection against the risk of ill treatment. There is an obligation to examine whether assurances provide, in their practical application, a sufficient guarantee that the applicant will be protected against the risk of ill treatment. The weight to be given to assurances from the receiving State depends, in each case, on the circumstances prevailing at the material time."

[75] Continuing, the court observed at [188], that cases in which the general human rights situation in the receiving state would preclude the attribution of any weight at all to assurances given would be rare. The judgment then provides the following guidance, at [189]:

"More usually, the Court will assess first, the quality of assurances given and, second, whether, in light of the receiving state's practices they can be relied upon. In doing so, the Court will have regard, inter alia, to the following factors:

- (1) whether the terms of the assurances have been disclosed to the Court 81;
- (2) whether the assurances are specific or are general and vague 82;
- (3) who has given the assurances and whether that person can bind the receiving state 83;
- (4) if the assurances have been issued by the central government of the receiving state, whether local authorities can be expected to abide by them 84; *59
- (5) whether the assurances concerns treatment which is legal or illegal in the receiving state 85;
- (6) whether they have been given by a Contracting State 86;
- (7) the length and strength of bilateral relations between the sending and receiving states, including the receiving state's record in abiding by similar assurances 87;

- (8) whether compliance with the assurances can be objectively verified through diplomatic or other monitoring mechanisms, including providing unfettered access to the applicant's lawyers 88;
- (9) whether there is an effective system of protection against torture in the receiving state, including whether it is willing to co-operate with international monitoring mechanisms (including international human-rights NGOs), and whether it is willing to investigate allegations of torture and to punish those responsible 89;
- (10) whether the applicant has previously been ill-treated in the receiving state 90; and
- (11) whether the reliability of the assurances has been examined by the domestic courts of the sending/Contracting State."

[76] We have already adverted to the symmetry between Article 3 ECHR and Article 4 of the Charter, clearly discernible in Aranyosi. In addition there is a clearly identifiable correlation between the detailed guidance in [189] of Othman and the albeit less prescriptive approach of the Grand Chamber in [89] - [98] of Aranyosi.

[77] There is an important decision of the ECtHR dealing directly with one discrete, but significant, aspect of the subject matter of these appeals. On 8 December 2015 judgement was given in Mironovas and Others v Lithuania [2015] ECHR 1074. These seven cases concerned Lithuanian nationals who had been detained on remand or imprisoned following conviction in various institutions: the Lukiskes Remand Prison, the "M" Prison and the "P" Prison. All of the applicants complained of overcrowding in inter alia prison dormitories and other aspects of prison conditions with descriptions ranging from the inadequate to the deplorable. They had all brought proceedings, successfully, in the Lithuanian courts, securing judgments upheld on appeal by the Supreme Administrative Court and recovering non-pecuniary damages measured in hundreds of euros.

[78] The evidence recounted in the judgment of the ECtHR enlarges the CPT history noted above. The first of the CPT delegation visits to Lithuania was conducted in 2008, giving rise to a report published on 25 June 2009. The problem of overcrowding in prisons generally had previously been highlighted by the CPT in its second General Report [CPT/INF(92)] and in subsequent annual reports. The 2009 report records that the CPT had previously published reports on conditions in Lithuania in 2000 and 2004. The 2009 report was followed by a further CPT report published on 19 July 2013. This followed inspections of the Siauliai and Kaunas Remand Prisons, the mixed remand/post-sentence Lukiskes Prison and the "A"

Prison. This report inter alia urged “vigorous efforts” to combat prison overcrowding. The official standards of minimum living space, namely 3.1 and 3.6 square metres for dormitories and multi-occupancy cells respectively, were condemned as too low. The report noted persisting problems of disrepair, dilapidation, lack of hygiene, inadequate equipment and inadequate heat and light.

[79] The evidence considered included the CPT Report of June 2014: see [14] supra. All of the applicants alleged violations of Article 3 ECHR. The court ruled that six of the seven applicants had received “plainly insufficient” compensation from the Lithuanian courts and, thus, retained their victim status. At [101] it set about the task of providing the Lithuanian authorities with “certain guidance on preventive remedies”. Such remedial measures would include constructing new prisons and devising new laws providing alternatives to imprisonment for persons convicted. In this context the court said, notably, at [106]:

“As to building new prisons, the Government promised to close the Lukiskes Remand Prison ... as in their response to the CPT in 2009

That prison is still operational ...”

This, we observe, falls to be considered in the context of the more recent evidence relating to this particular establishment and the broader issue of the failure of the Lithuanian authorities to honour their assurances.

[80] At [115] - [116] the court provided the following formulation of general principle:

“(b) General principles on compliance with Article 3

The Court reiterates that Article 3 of the Convention enshrines one of the most fundamental values of a democratic society. It prohibits in absolute terms torture or inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, irrespective of the circumstances and the victim’s behaviour (see, for example, Labita v. Italy [GC], no. 26772/95, § 119, ECHR 2000-IV). Ill-treatment must attain a minimum level of severity if it is to fall within the scope of Article 3. The assessment of this minimum is relative; it depends on all the circumstances of the case, such as the duration of the treatment, its physical and mental effects and, in some cases, the sex, age and state of health of the victim (see, among other authorities, Ireland v. the United Kingdom, 18 January 1978, § 162, Series A no. 25).

116. Ill-treatment that attains such a minimum level of severity usually involves actual bodily injury or intense physical or mental suffering. However, even in the absence of these, where treatment humiliates or debases an individual, showing a lack of respect for or diminishing his or her human dignity, or arouses feelings of fear, anguish or inferiority capable of breaking an individual's moral and physical resistance, it may be characterised as degrading and also fall within the prohibition of Article 3 (see Ananyev and Others, cited above, § 140, with further references)."

The court turned to the specific subject of Art 3 and detention conditions:

"117. In the context of deprivation of liberty the Court has consistently stressed that, to fall under Article 3, the suffering and humiliation involved must in any event go beyond that inevitable element of suffering and humiliation connected with detention. The State must ensure that a person is detained in conditions which are compatible with respect for human dignity, that the manner and method of the execution of the measure do not subject him to distress or hardship of an intensity exceeding the unavoidable level of suffering inherent in detention and that, given the practical demands of imprisonment, his health and well-being are adequately secured (see Kudła, cited above, §§ 92-94; and Popov v. Russia, no. 26853/04, § 208, 13 July 2006).

118. When assessing conditions of detention, account has to be taken of the cumulative effects of those conditions, as well as of specific allegations made by the applicant (see Dougoz, cited above, § 46; Ramirez Sanchez, cited above, § 119). The length of the period during which a person is detained in the particular conditions also has to be considered (see Alver v. Estonia, no. 64812/01, § 50, 8 November 2005)119. Extreme lack of space in a prison cell weighs heavily as a 'central factor' to be taken into account for the purpose of establishing whether the impugned detention conditions were "degrading" from the point of view of Article 3 (see Karalevičius v. Lithuania, no. 53254/99, §§ 36 and 39, 7 April 2005; and, more recently, Vladimir Belyayev v. Russia, no. 9967/06, § 30, 17 October 2013)."

[81] The court next, having noted previous decisions that Article 3 had been breached where prison inmates had less than three square metres of personal surface in a cell where they were locked most of the time, and noting that it had thitherto refrained from prescribing a minimum, continued at [122]:

"122. Applying this approach, the Court has found that the strong presumption that the conditions of detention amounted to degrading treatment in breach of Article 3 on account of a lack of personal space were refuted by the cumulative effect of the conditions of detention. These included the brevity of the applicant's incarceration (see, for example, Fetisov and Others v. Russia, nos. 43710/07, 6023/08, 11248/08, 27668/08, 31242/08 and 52133/08, § 138, 17 January 2012, and Dmitriy Rozhin v. Russia, no. 4265/06, § 53, 23 October 2012) or the freedom of movement afforded to inmates and their unobstructed access to natural light and air (see, for example, Shkurenko v. Russia (dec.), no. 15010/04, 10 September 2009)."

[82] There followed a cautionary qualification: on the other hand, even in cases where the inmates appeared to have sufficient personal space at their disposal and where a larger prison cell was at issue - measuring in the range of three to four square metres per inmate - the court noted other aspects of physical conditions of detention as being relevant for the assessment of compliance with Article 3. It found a violation of that provision since the space factor was coupled with an established lack of ventilation and lighting (see, for example, Vlasov v. Russia, no. 78146/01, §§ 81 and 84, 12 June 2008) and a lack of outdoor exercise (see Longin v. Croatia, no. 49268/10, §§ 60-61, 6 November 2012).

[83] The decision of the ECtHR in Mironovas and Others is important in these appeals for two main reasons. First, it forms a significant part of the history and evidential matrix considered in Chapter IV above. Second, it is, unusually, an Article 3 decision specially designed to transcend the boundaries of the individual cases wherein it was made.

[84] We return at this point to the cohort of leading CJEU decisions. On 25 July 2018 the CJEU gave judgement in ML [2018] EUE CJC - 220/18 PPU. The court, in the context of a preliminary reference in a case concerning the proposed extradition by Germany of a person to Hungary, the central concern was the real risk of exposure to inhuman or degrading treatment by reason of prison conditions in the requesting state. The court addressed the specific issue of assurances given by the requesting state, at [108] - [117]. It stated at [112]:

"(Where an assurance is) given, or at least endorsed, by the issuing judicial authority ... the executing judicial authority, in view of the mutual trust which must exist between the judicial authorities must rely on that assurance, at least in the absence of any specific indications that the detention conditions in a particular detention centre (infringe Article 3 ECHR)."

[emphasis added]

The court added: where there are indications of conditions infringing Article 3 ECHR or where the assurance has not been provided or endorsed by the issuing judicial authority, it is incumbent upon the executing judicial authority to undertake "an overall assessment of all the information available to it": see [114].

[85] The themes and principles addressed so extensively by the Grand Chamber in Aranyosi resurfaced in its more recent decision in Dorobantu [Case C-128/18), in which judgment was given on 16 October 2019. Once again this decision was generated by the preliminary reference mechanism. It involved a case in which the requesting state was Romania and the requested state was Germany. The questions referred related to the minimum standards for custodial conditions prescribed by Article 4 of the Charter in the context of the EAW and surrender procedures. The ruling of the Grand Chamber, at [85], was in four parts:

“Article 1(3) of Framework Decision 2002/584 , read in conjunction with art.4 of the Charter, must be interpreted as meaning that when the executing judicial authority has objective, reliable, specific and properly updated information showing there to be systemic or generalised deficiencies in the conditions of detention in the prisons of the issuing Member State, it must, for the purpose of assessing whether there are substantial grounds for believing that, following the surrender to the issuing Member State of the person subject to a European arrest warrant, that person will run a real risk of being subjected to inhuman or degrading treatment within the meaning of art.4 of the Charter, take account of all the relevant physical aspects of the conditions of detention in the prison in which it is actually intended that that person will be detained, such as the personal space available to each detainee in a cell in that prison, sanitary conditions and the extent of the detainee’s freedom of movement within the prison. That assessment is not limited to the review of obvious inadequacies. For the purposes of that assessment, the executing judicial authority must request from the issuing judicial authority the information that it deems necessary and must rely, in principle, on the assurances given by the issuing judicial authority, in the absence of any specific indications that the conditions of detention infringe art.4 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights.”

(ii) “As regards, in particular, the personal space available to each detainee, the executing judicial authority must, in the absence, currently, of minimum standards in that respect under EU law, take account of the minimum requirements under art.3 of the ECHR, as interpreted by the European Court of Human Rights. Although, in calculating that available space, the area occupied by sanitary facilities should not be taken into account, the calculation should include space occupied by furniture. Detainees must, however, still have the possibility of moving around normally within the cell.”

(iii) “The executing judicial authority cannot rule out the existence of a real risk of inhuman or degrading treatment merely because the person concerned has, in the issuing Member State, a legal remedy enabling that person to challenge the conditions of his detention or because there are, in the issuing Member State, legislative or structural measures that are intended to reinforce the monitoring of detention conditions.”

(iv) “A finding, by the executing judicial authority, that there are substantial grounds for believing that, following the surrender of the person concerned to the issuing Member State, that person will run such a risk, because of the conditions of detention prevailing in the prison in which it is actually intended that he will be detained, cannot be weighed, for the purposes of deciding on that surrender, against considerations relating to the efficacy of judicial co-operation in criminal matters and to the principles of mutual trust and recognition.”

[86] Noting its earlier decisions (ML et al) the court provided the following convenient summary of their effect at [50]:

“... Subject to certain conditions, the executing judicial authority has an obligation to bring the surrender procedure ... to an end where surrender may result in the requested person being subjected to inhuman or degrading treatment within the meaning of Article 4 of the Charter ...”

[Emphasis added.]

A second notable feature of this decision is the focus on the actual prison in which the requested person is expected to be detained: see [66]. The rationale of this is distilled from [62] – [65], namely the inter-related requirements that the assessment of the court of the requested state must be “specific and precise” and, further, must not be “limited to obvious inadequacies only”. A further striking feature of the Grand Chamber’s decision is its reiteration of ML (at [92]) that in cases where the personal space available to a detained person is less than three square metres in multi-occupancy accommodation, this will operate as a “strong presumption” of a violation of Article 3 ECHR: see [72].

[87] Continuing, at [75], the court, drawing on the jurisprudence of the ECtHR, added that even where this minimum space requirement is satisfied, it may nonetheless be a relevant factor to be weighed in conjunction with other aspects of “inappropriate physical conditions of detention” – such as lack of outdoor exercise, natural light or air, poor ventilation, inadequate room temperature et al – in determining whether a violation of Article 3 is established: see [75] – [76]. A final notable feature of this decision is the court’s identification at [79] of one specific option available to the requested state, namely it may –

“... make the surrender to the issuing Member State of the person concerned by a European Arrest Warrant subject only to compliance with (Article 4 of the Charter)”.

The court’s expressed rationale for formulating this option was that of avoiding compromise of the efficacy of the Framework Decision by fortifying the principles of mutual trust and recognition upon which it is based.

X THE RECENT ENGLISH DECISIONS

[88] These appeals are illustrations of the circumstances in which judicial decisions may acquire the status of adjudications and evidence. As our resume of the assurances/guarantees evidence above demonstrates, the various communications from the Lithuanian Government were addressed to both Belfast County Court and appropriate English agencies, in particular the CPS. The interaction between the English agencies and the Lithuanian Government evidently occurred under Article 15(2) of the Framework Decision, in the context of pending appeals in certain extradition cases before the English Divisional Court. The exercise of considering these decisions in chronological sequence facilitates identification of which elements of the evidence considered above were available to the court at the time of each successive judicial decision. It further enhances the task of assessing the evolution of the broader evidential framework.

[89] The first case belonging to this discrete cohort is that of Jane v Prosecutor General’s Office, Lithuania. This case generated two decisions of the Divisional Court, separated by some five months: see [2018] EWHC 1122 (Admin) and [2018] EWHC 2691 (Admin). The EAW in play in this case was of the “accusation” variety. The court’s focus was, therefore, on the likely conditions which the appellant would encounter in a Lithuanian remand prison. At [20] the court identified the two Lithuanian remand prisons which feature prominently in the evidence which we have considered, taking as its starting point that as regards these two establishments:

“... there is a real risk to prisoners of impermissible treatment contrary to Article 3 of the ECHR.”

[90] This assessment, notably, was based on a series of judicial decisions, beginning with Lithuania v Campbell [2013] NIQB 19, followed by several decisions of the English High Court, one of the Irish High Court and one of the Constitutional Court of Malta spanning the period 2013 to 2017. The next step which the court took was to examine certain fresh evidence which it admitted. This consisted of an expert report (considered both at first instance and by this court in these appeals), the CPT report of 2018, a more recent Irish High Court decision, critical Lithuania Parliamentary Ombudsman’s Report and certain recent decisions of Lithuanian courts making adverse findings about conditions in remand prisons. Certain further evidence from the Lithuanian Government was also considered. The court’s assessment of all of this evidence was as follows, at [41]:

“ ... there remains a real risk that a person who is sent to remand conditions will suffer inhuman or degrading treatment contrary to Article 3 of the ECHR. This is because although it is apparent that Lithuania has taken many commendable steps to improve the position of remand prisons, there is at present no clear and cogent evidence from Lithuania to show that there is no real risk that the impermissible treatment which has been suffered by remand prisoners will no longer be suffered. The court determined to exercise its power under Article 15(2) to give Lithuania an opportunity to provide further assurances sufficient to dispel the risk identified.”

[91] The course taken by the Divisional Court provided the impetus for the second of its judgments, some five months later. The second judgment records that in the wake of the first seven further assurances were provided by the Lithuanian Government, in June 2018 and a further assurance dated 7 August 2018. (We would observe, albeit with some degree of caution, that these assurances appear to be in the materials before this court.) The court, referring to these assurances and the CPT reports, stated at [11]:

“ ... while there remains a real risk of impermissible treatment in remand prisons other than Kaunas, Lithuania continues to make considerable efforts to improve conditions in its remand prisons. The evidence of the [assurances] shows that Lithuania has engaged with the issues raised by this court about the real risk of impermissible treatment of Mr Jane. It is now for this court to assess whether the assurance dated 7 August 2018 removes any real risk of impermissible treatment if Mr Jane were to be extradited.”

The court reiterated its earlier assessment that the appellant, if surrendered, would probably be accommodated in Lukiskes Remand Prison. The Lithuanian further assurance of 7 August 2018 had the following components: the appellant would be accommodated in a cell (to be contrasted with a dormitory); the cell would have minimum dimensions of 3 square metres; he would be accommodated only in one of the renovated cells; and his accommodation and treatment would be compliant with Article 3 ECHR. Acting on these assurances the court dismissed the appeal. It concluded that there was no longer a real risk of the appellant suffering proscribed treatment: see [18] – [19]. Notably, the court described overcrowding as the “main problem” which the assurances had addressed.

[92] The second member of the cohort of recent English decisions is Bartulis v Prosecutor General’s Office Lithuania [2019] EWHC 3504 (Admin). These conjoined appeals concerned three Lithuanian nationals resisting surrender to their state of origin pursuant to five EAWs, a mixture of the “accusation” and “conviction” species. The appellant’s case is encapsulated in [8] of the judgment:

“The appellants submit that ... there is cogent, relevant and reliable evidence in support of the proposition that there is a real risk of detention in inhuman and degrading conditions if these appellants are extradited to any of the three male prisons [A, M and P].”

The next paragraph of the judgment makes clear that the central plank of the appellant’s Article 3 case was –

“... the risk of violence amounting to breaches of Article 3 by other inmates of these prisons and whether the prison authorities in Lithuania can provide adequate protection ...”.

The court noted that the dormitory style accommodation forming much of the capacity of these three prisons was a factor in the asserted risk. The evidence considered by the court included the CPT reports and the expert report noted above. In passing, at first instance, the author of this report had given oral testimony: see [24]. The AP, considered in [26] – [27] above, was also available to the court, as were certain assurances: see [47] – [57].

[93] The court considered its task to belong to two stages, first, to consider “the level of risk and the initial issue of the presumption together”, before “considering the assurances”: see [114]. The court considered the problem of inter-prisoner violence to be real, not fanciful: [118]. Next it considered the CPT reports to be objective, reliable, specific and up to date: [119]. Next the court’s assessment of the steps taken by the Lithuanian authorities, with specific reference to the AP, was one of “an adequate response”. At [122] it reckoned the factor of “ready access to lawyers and the domestic courts”, together with the low incidence of murder and crimes of serious assault. Finally, at [124] – [125] the court adverted to the clear awareness on the part of the Lithuanian authorities of their legal obligations in the extradition context and the absence of any consensus among EU Member States that the presumption had been displaced. The omnibus conclusion of the court was expressed in the next succeeding paragraph, at [126]:

“Taking all these factors together, we conclude, after a balancing exercise, that the presumption of compliance has not been displaced. Without the Action Plan and the evidence of implementation, real if incomplete, our decision might have been otherwise.”

The following paragraph [126] makes clear that, in light of this conclusion, the court did not proceed to the second stage of considering the Lithuanian Government’s assurances.

[94] The last of this trilogy of English Divisional Court decisions is Gerulskis v Prosecutor General's Office of Lithuania [2020] EWHC 1645 (Admin). This decision was promulgated on 26 June 2020. Here the court dismissed two appeals against orders for extradition to Lithuania. The appeals raised a common issue concerning prison conditions in Lithuania and assurances given by the Lithuanian authorities. In each case the EAW was of the "accusation" variety. The appellant's Article 3 ECHR objection to extradition arose for the first time on appeal and was based on evidence of Lithuanian prison conditions and Lithuanian Government assurances not considered at first instance. The appellants contended inter alia that the Lithuanian Government's assurance in the case of Mr Jane (supra) had been breached and that the same had occurred in the case of another extradited Lithuanian national. While the court found a partial breach of the assurance regarding Mr Jane, relating to the prison where he had been detained post-extradition, it nonetheless held that the most important aspect of the assurance, namely the provision of a minimum of 3 square metres of cell space had been honoured. The court found that there had been no breach of assurance in the other case.

[95] At [58] – [60] the court gave specific consideration to the "Covid Caveat" letter of 3 April 2020 and the further information of 29 May 2020 and 9 June 2020. It described the Covid Caveat as demonstrating "both transparency and a proper regard for the importance of communicating ... in accordance with the principles of the Framework Decision". It highlighted the continuing two fold assurances that surrendered persons would be guaranteed a minimum of 3 square metres of cell space and would be detained only in the renovated parts of the Siauliai Remand Prison, concluding:

"This shows that there does not exist a real risk of impermissible treatment contrary to Article 3 of the ECHR."

Next the court pronounced itself satisfied that the Lithuanian assurances should be neither discounted nor ignored.

XI The First Instance Decision

[96] The last in the succession of judgments of Belfast County Court are those under challenge in this court, dated 27 and 30 November 2020 respectively. It is necessary to allocate these two judgements to their correct context. Each had the same starting point and the same aetiology. The starting point was the assessment in the first of the five judgements of Belfast County Court (8 January 2018) that there was objective, reliable, specific and properly updated evidence of a real risk of inhuman or degrading treatment in the event of the extradition of this appellant to Lithuania. While the judge's main concern was that of inadequate cell space and the related phenomenon of prison overcrowding, it was not thus confined: see [47] – [49] and [57] – [58], considered in tandem with the underpinning evidence.

[97] The judge examined the generic ground of resistance, based on Article 3

ECHR. It was noted that those aspects of Lithuanian prison conditions to be considered were overcrowding, the risk arising out of transmissible diseases (HIV and Hepatitis) emanating from drug use, the lack of a multi-disciplinary programme of prevention, the inappropriate use of restraint beds and inter-prisoner violence. The CPT Reports evidencing these problems were confined to three specific correctional facilities. The judgment further noted the most recent sequence relating to the request for and provision of assurances, namely the “Covid caveat” letter provided by the Lithuanian authorities dated 3 April 2020, the court’s further request for assurances dated 30 June 2020 and the final response from the requesting state, dated 19 August 2020.

[98] The judgment pays particular attention to the cases which we have considered above, in particular: the governing principles formulated by the CJEU Grand Chamber in Dorobantu v Romania and certain recent decisions of the English Divisional Court involving other EU Member States: Danfolds v Latvia [2020] and Choudhary v France [2020] EWHC

[99] At [30] the judge formulated the main question for the court in these terms:

“The issue is whether the court’s earlier findings that there is a real risk of a breach of Article 3 if the requested person is surrendered continues to be relevant in light of efforts to deal with serious systemic problems, in particular the action plan which has only recently been disclosed, the fact that no Member State has refused to surrender the requested person on the grounds of conditions in correctional facilities and the recent information regarding the Covid situation in Lithuania.”

The judge highlighted the potency of the presumption that absent clear evidence to the contrary the court must accept that another EU Member State will comply with its ECHR obligations.

[100] The judge described the AP as “highly significant”. The English High Court’s assessment that this represented an adequate response to difficult problems was noted. The candour of the Lithuanian Government’s letter of 3 April 2020 was highlighted. So too was the absence of any evidence that the pandemic had resulted in previous guarantees being breached. The judge further noted that every case is fact specific and “... the overarching principle to be applied in determining applications for extradition is trust, confidence and mutual respect.” These several building blocks impelled the judge to the following conclusion at [34]:

“Taking all of those matters into account, I consider that the requesting state is now entitled to the benefit of the presumption that it will comply with the Defendant’s rights if extradited. In reaching this conclusion, I have noted the warning in Bartulis that the eyes of the world are watching and the effect of this judgment does not mean that guarantees to ensure the human rights of prisoners can be ignored.”

XII The Article 3 ECHR Appeal

[101] This ground of appeal is common to many of the 11 cases. The first submission of Mr Sayers QC on behalf of this appellant was that the statement in the final judgment of Belfast County Court that the issues before that court and the English Divisional Court in the cases of Bartulis and Gerulskis were “to all intense and purposes the same” is incorrect. Mr Sayers submitted that the dominant issue in Bartulis was that of inter-prisoner violence giving rise to breaches of Article 3 ECHR. As appears from our analysis of this decision above, we consider this submission well made. We further accept Mr Sayers’ related submission that neither the judgment of Belfast County Court nor that in Bartulis engages with the specific expert evidence to the effect that one aspect of the remedial measures proposed (in paragraph 1.4 of the AP) namely the relocation of the leading figures would not be an effective solution, for the reasons given.

[102] We further agree with the third main submission of Mr Sayers, which is that the Lithuanian Government’s representations in the letter of October 2019 relating to steps taken to combat the problem of transmission of serious communicable diseases is without more incompatible with what was stated in the AP 13 months previously. Furthermore, as submitted, the court below did not engage specifically with the clear evidence of significant growing numbers of new HIV infection cases post-dating measures said to have been implemented in January 2017.

[103] Mr Sayers further submitted that the judge’s ready adoption of the decisions in Bartulis and Gerulskis does not reflect that in her first two judgments there were specific findings of evidence of a real risk of inhuman or degrading treatment contrary to Article 3 ECHR, coupled with a specific finding that the Lithuanian Government had failed to answer the questions posed by the court and a separate assessment that there was “ample evidence that general guarantees regarding prison conditions have been shown to be unreliable” with reference to the second CPT report. In contrast (the argument runs), in the case of Gerulskis there was no initial assessment by either the first instance court or (on appeal) the Divisional Court of a real risk of Article 3 ECHR breaches. He argued that the Divisional Court’s favourable assessment of the “Covid Caveat” in Gerulskis must be viewed with circumspection. Finally, he highlighted an inconsistency in the requesting state’s evidence relating to measures designed to combat the transmission of communicable diseases, specifically HIV and Hepatitis C.

[104] The primary submission advanced to this court on behalf of Mr M involved a new argument not deployed at first instance. The first element of this submission, namely that the effect of the “Covid Caveat” letter is to rescind all previous Lithuanian Government guarantees in respect of all surrendered persons, is uncontentious. The second element of this submission was that the replacement guarantees relate to persons surrendered pursuant to accusation warrants only i.e. actual or putative remand prisoners.

[105] We have examined above the Lithuanian Government's letter of 3 April 2020 and attachment, together with the latest communication, in some detail. We have analysed these documents in their surrounding context, including previous communications from the same source. We have further considered the latest communications from the Lithuanian authorities. Having done so, we have reached the clear conclusion that the extant guarantees apply to remand prisoners only. This, of course, is the cohort of the prison population to which this appellant would belong if surrendered, namely persons surrendered to Lithuania pursuant to an "accusation" EAW. We consider it abundantly clear that those such as Mr M, whose surrender would be pursuant to a "conviction" EAW, are excluded from the new guarantee. Furthermore, they will not have the benefit of any of the assurances or guarantees which have been forthcoming from the Lithuanian Government from time to time. Thus the court accepted the new submission on behalf of Mr M (see [2021] NIQB 60).

[106] At this juncture it is necessary to identify clearly what the task of this court is in its resolution of the Article 3 ECHR ground of appeal. This exercise is essential having regard to the decisions of the Grand Chamber in Aranyosi, ML and Dorobantu. In Aranyosi the Grand Chamber provided detailed, prescriptive guidance on the role of the court of the requested state. We consider that this guidance clearly prescribes two stages. At the first stage, the court must make an assessment of whether there is a real risk of inhuman or degrading treatment infringing Article 4 of the Charter (Article 3 ECHR). We consider it clear from Aranyosi, particularly at [88] – [89], that at this initial stage the court's enquiry belongs to the general level, i.e. it is focused on detention conditions generally without specific reference to the circumstances of the requested person. This enquiry may, inexhaustively, be directed to "systemic or generalised" deficiencies or deficiencies affecting certain groups of people or deficiencies affecting certain places of detention. The information on which this initial assessment is made must be "objective, reliable, specific and properly updated on the detention conditions": see [89]. In passing, the judgment in Aranyosi is silent on the question of whether recourse to the requested state's powers under Article 15(2) is appropriate at this (later) stage. Having regard to the breadth of the terms in which this power is couched and the nature of the judicial decision to be made it would be surprising if Article 15(2) could not be invoked at this initial stage.

[107] In the abstract, it would appear that the requested state's court's initial enquiry, with or without recourse to Article 15(2), can in principle yield only one of two possible outcomes, namely a conclusion, or "finding" per Aranyosi at [91], that there is – or is not – "a real risk of inhuman or degrading treatment by virtue of general conditions of detention in the issuing member state ...". If the court concludes that there is no such risk no further stage of judicial enquiry arises.

[108] However, where the court concludes that there is such a risk, a second stage arises. It is at this stage that the distinction between the general and the particular becomes especially clear. Notably, the Grand Chamber does not frame the task of the court at this, the second, stage in the terms of discretionary options. Rather, the judgment states unequivocally, at [95], that the court of the requested state at this stage must direct a request or requests to the judicial authority of the requesting state under Article 15(2). This request must focus on “the particular circumstances of the case the individual concerned ...” Aranyosi also prescribes the terms in which this second stage request is to be formulated. It must seek “all necessary supplementary information on the conditions in which it is envisaged that the individual concerned will be detained in that Member State”: see [95]. A request in these terms is obligatory. Aranyosi further makes clear that this request may optionally relate to the existence of any procedures and mechanisms for the monitoring of detention conditions in the requesting state: see [96]. On receipt of this request the issuing judicial authority is subjected to a duty: it is “obliged” to provide the information sought: see [97].

[109] Pausing, there is no indication in any of the CJEU decisions that the inter-state interaction at the second stage is confined to a single request and a single response. We consider that in every case it will be for the court of the requested state to make an assessment of the point at which this interaction is complete. At this point the court finds itself asking precisely the same question which it addressed at the first stage, namely whether –

“... there exists, for the individual, a real risk of inhuman or degrading treatment (contravening Article 4 of the Charter)”
(See [98]).

[110] It is clear from [98] – [104] of Aranyosi that, in common with the first stage, the second stage gives rise to two possible outcomes. The first possible outcome is a finding by the court that the aforementioned risk exists. Where this occurs, Aranyosi states unambiguously, at [98], that the execution of the EAW “... must be postponed while it cannot be abandoned ...” Where postponement occurs the requested state must inform Eurojust, per Article 17(7) of the Framework Decision. Does Aranyosi prescribe clearly what is to happen thereafter? We shall examine this discrete issue by revisiting firstly the Aranyosi – related CJEU decisions.

[111] ML is, in sequence, the second of the trilogy of CJEU decisions considered above. The essential question raised in this Article 267 reference was where the executing judicial authority has information showing systemic or generalised deficiencies in the detention conditions in the prisons of the requesting state, that authority may exclude a real risk that the requested person will be subjected to treatment proscribed by Article 4 of the Charter simply on account of the availability in the requesting state of a legal remedy enabling the subject to challenge the conditions of his detention. At [58] – [66] the First Chamber repeated almost verbatim the corresponding passages in Aranyosi. The court answered the essential question referred at [75]:

“Therefore, even if the issuing Member State provides for legal remedies that make it possible to review the legality of detention conditions from the perspective of the fundamental rights, the executing judicial authorities are still bound to undertake an individual assessment of the situation of each person concerned, in order to satisfy themselves that their decision on the surrender of that person will not expose him, on account of those conditions, to a real risk of inhuman or degrading treatment within the meaning of Article 4 of the Charter.”

[112] The second element of this preliminary ruling indicates that the duty of the requesting state to respond to requests for information by the executing state is, in substance, subject to considerations of relevance, proportionality and expedition. Requests for information which are not harmonious with these values, moreover, are not compatible with the duty of sincere co-operation enshrined in Article 4(3) TEU: see [103] –[104]. At [111] the court stated that where the requesting state provides an assurance that the requested person will not suffer inhuman or degrading treatment in detention this cannot be disregarded by the requested state. Elaborating, the court added at [112] that the requested state “... must rely on that assurance, at least in the absence of any specific indications that the detention conditions in a particular detention centre are in breach of Article 4 of the Charter”.

[113] Next the court gave consideration to the question of an assurance emanating from the requesting state which has neither been given nor endorsed by the issuing judicial authority. The court appeared to indicate that such assurances carry less weight. An assurance of this kind “... must be evaluated by carrying out an overall assessment of all the information available to the executing judicial authority”: see [112] – [114]. Finally, the judgment makes clear that the scope of the requested state’s enquiry is confined to the place of detention where “... according to the information available to it, it is likely that the person will be detained, including on a temporary or transitional basis”: see [117].

[114] We have reconsidered the third of the three CJEU decisions in question, Dorobantu, from the particular perspective of whether it modifies in any way the two-stage approach and other procedural prescriptions specified in Aranyosi. It appears to us from the relevant passages in Dorobantu, paragraphs [45] – [55], the court evidently considered it unnecessary to do so. This is perhaps unsurprising having regard to the central thrust of the questions referred, which sought guidance on the extent and scope of the review which the executing judicial authority must conduct when it is in possession of information demonstrating systemic or generalised deficiencies in the detention conditions of the prisons in the requesting state. It is clear from the judgment that this enquiry belongs to the second of the two stages established by Aranyosi. The short point emerging from this discrete and focused reconsideration of the three CJEU decisions is that the two-stage approach endorsed in Aranyosi continues to apply without modification.

[115] We consider that this court must correctly orientate itself in the exercise of identifying what its task is. This court, by virtue of the domestic legal arrangements of the United Kingdom and with specific reference to the jurisdiction of Northern Ireland, is the second court in sequence which has become seized of the fundamental question, namely whether the appellants, or either of them, should be surrendered to the Lithuanian state. The judicial consideration and process which have preceded this court's appellate involvement cannot in our view be detached or disregarded.

[116] The most important feature of the first and second of the judgments of Judge Smyth is the assessment that there was evidence of a real risk of inhuman or degrading treatment in the event of Mr D being surrendered to Lithuania. Given that Mr D's case had the status of lead case, it is not in dispute that this assessment applied to all members of the group. We consider it clear that this assessment belonged to the first of the two Aranyosi stages. The assessment was made in the first judgment and the impetus for repeating it in the second was the judge's conclusion that the Lithuanian state had failed to answer the specific questions addressed following the first judgment and should be required to provide specific assurances in the terms of [35] of the second judgment. We further consider that following the promulgation of the first judgment everything which unfolded culminating in the final two judgments of Belfast County Court belonged to the second of the Aranyosi stages.

[117] We consider that the following question of some importance arises: in cases where the court of the requested state completes the two stages described above and answers the "real risk" question in the affirmative, is postponement of the execution of the EAW the only course available to the court? Furthermore, if the answer to this question is affirmative, what is the court to do thereafter? At first blush and superficially, paragraph [98] of Aranyosi appears to state that where the executing judicial authority, having completed the two stages, considers that there is a real risk of inhuman or degrading treatment regarding the detention conditions in which the requested person is expected to be accommodated, the court must postpone execution of the EAW. However, in both the conclusion expressed in [104] and in the operative part ("dispositif") of its judgment, the court states unequivocally:

"If the existence of that risk cannot be discounted within a reasonable time, the executing judicial authority must decide whether the surrender procedure should be brought to an end."

The question which arises is whether in the passages under scrutiny the Grand Chamber is expressing itself in different ways, to the extent that there is a disparity which this court must attempt to resolve.

[118] In paragraph [98] of Aranyosi the operative sentence is followed by "See, by analogy, Lanigan's case ..." This is a reference to Minister for Justice and Equality v Lanigan [C-237/15 PPU]. This case was concerned with the effect of the expiry of the time limit specified in Article 17 of the Framework Decision, which contemplates a maximum period of 90 days for judicial decision following the arrest of the requested person in a contested case. This time limit is subject to “exceptional circumstances” and observance of a specified related procedure involving Eurojust. The Grand Chamber provided a twofold response to the questions referred by the Irish High Court:

- (i) Where the time limits prescribed by Article 17 have expired the executing judicial authority remains under a duty to make its decision on surrender.
- (ii) The continued detention of the requested person in such a situation does not contravene the Framework Decision.

It is in this context that we turn to consider what the court stated in [38] of its judgment:

“That interpretation is corroborated by the fact that the EU legislature expressly envisaged, in Article 17(7) of the Framework Decision, the situation in which a Member State finds itself unable to observe the time-limits stipulated in Article 17, without providing that the executing judicial authority would thus no longer be able to adopt the decision on the execution of the European arrest warrant or that the obligation to carry out the execution procedure of the European arrest warrant would, in that case, be removed. Article 17(7) of the Framework Decision refers, moreover, to the occurrence of repeated ‘delays ... in the execution’, which shows, therefore, that the EU legislature considered that, in a situation in which those time-limits have not been observed, the execution of the European arrest warrant is postponed, not abandoned.”

[119] We consider that the purpose of the reference in [98] of Aranyosi to Lanigan, paragraph [38], was to remind executing judicial authorities that they are not absolved of their duty to make a decision on surrender in cases where the time limits prescribed by Article 17 have expired. It makes perfect sense that the Grand Chamber would do so when one considers the context, namely the prescription of a series of steps to be observed in making a final decision on whether the surrender of a requested person might in certain circumstances violate such person’s rights under Article 4 of the Charter. The procedure which the Grand Chamber laid down for the second of the two stages obliges the executing judicial authority to exercise its powers under Article 15(2) of the Framework Decision. There is no suggestion that the judicial authority can have recourse to this power only once. Furthermore, in a context where the possible breach of a person’s fundamental rights is in play and taking into account the enhanced vigilance thereby required of the judicial authority of the executing State the Grand Chamber must have contemplated the possibility that the interaction between the judicial authority and the requesting state under Article 15 might entail several exchanges.

[120] Finally, in this context, we consider that two of the principles underlying the Framework Decision must have some purchase, namely those of a simplified procedure and expedition. See especially recital [5] of the Framework Decision and the decision in Melloni [C-399/11] at [37], a passage which is worth reproducing in full:

“Framework Decision 2002/584 thus seeks, by the establishment of a new simplified and more effective system for the surrender of persons convicted or suspected of having infringed criminal law, to facilitate and accelerate judicial co-operation with a view to contributing to the objective set for the European Union to become an area of freedom, security and justice by basing itself on the high degree of confidence which should exist between the Member States ...”

[Our emphasis.]

[121] It follows that, in our judgment, the prohibition on abandonment expressed in [98] of Aranyosi means that the executing judicial authority cannot abdicate its responsibility to make a final decision on surrender. Second, having regard to the broader context which we have highlighted, in particular the principle of expedited judicial decision making, the antithesis whereof is lengthy and avoidable delay, we are confident that the Grand Chamber’s reference to postponement of the execution of the EAW in [98] does not constitute an instruction, or even exhortation, to the issuing judicial authority to defer its final decision indefinitely.

[122] This is reinforced by the statement in [104], replicated in the dispositif in [105]:

“The executing judicial authority must postpone its decision on the surrender of the individual concerned until it obtains the supplementary information that allows it to discount the existence of such a risk.”

We consider this to convey clearly that postponement of the judicial authority’s final decision occurs upon completion of the first stage and as a natural consequence of the authority’s determination to proceed to the second stage. This is followed by:

“If the existence of that risk cannot be discounted within a reasonable time, the executing judicial authority must decide whether the surrender procedure should be brought to an end.”

We consider that this statement, again viewed in its broad context, conveys clearly that during the second stage the executing judicial authority must be aware of the Article 17 time limits and the principles highlighted above, with the result that it cannot defer its final decision indefinitely. We further consider that “brought to an end” must denote a refusal of the surrender request and the consequential discharge of the requested person since where the existence of the relevant risk “cannot be discounted”, it seems virtually impossible to envisage that the judicial authority has any other choice at its disposal.

XIII The Lithuanian Responses Further Analysed

[123] We summarise the evidential matrix pertaining to Mr D thus. On 8 January 2019 Belfast County Court made an assessment that there was evidence of a real risk of inhuman or degrading treatment in the detention conditions to which Mr D would predictably be subjected in the event of his surrender to Lithuania. The judge assessed this evidence as objective, reliable, specific and properly updated. We consider it clear from the judgment of Judge Smyth that the specific concern was that of prison overcrowding: see especially paragraphs [30] – [40] and [49] – [50]. Pausing, this court must of course be alert to other relevant adverse aspects of detention either caused or exacerbated by the root problem of overcrowding. Taking into account the breadth of the evidence considered by the judge, rehearsed extensively in the judgment, together with [40] and [48] – [59] thereof, we are inclined to think that the purview of the judge’s assessment extended beyond the single issue of overcrowded prison accommodation in Lithuania.

[124] Whatever the correct analysis of the first of the judge’s four judgments, the most important task for this court is to assess the here and now, taking into account all that has occurred during the journey which has unfolded subsequently. This court must also be alert to the vintage of the Lithuanian Government’s assurances which, in the first of the judgments, that court found to be inadequate. They were provided in an earlier case (Lithuania v Vengalis, unreported, January 2017): see [21] and [44]. Some three months later, in the second of its judgments, Belfast County Court concluded that the Lithuanian Government had failed to answer the specific questions posed by the court in the wake of its first judgment. By this stage the evidence available to the court included the 2018 CPT report. The court determined to transmit a request for three further specific assurances. This was the state of play as of 23 March 2019.

[125] The Lithuanian Government replied on 17 April 2019. This was in the terms of a “general guarantee” of Lithuanian imprisonment conditions, being Article 3 ECHR compliant, as regards the first two specific assurances sought. This court considers that the engagement with these first two questions was evasive and inadequate. As regards the third assurance sought, the standard of the response was considerably better, being an indication that restraint beds in three named prisons could possibly be used in exceptional circumstances, in particular to restrain aggressive inmates.

[126] The next milestone was in February 2020. This marked the third of the communications from Belfast County Court to the Lithuanian Government. A notable feature of the three further assurances thereby sought is that the focus of the judge was no longer on Mr D individually or, indeed, any other member of the growing group of Lithuanian nationals whose cases were pending before Belfast County Court: contrast the three requests for assurances at [35] of the second judgment. The Lithuanian Government's response was as noted in Chapter V above and we have analysed it in Chapter VI.

[127] The third series of assurances requested by Belfast County Court is contained in the letter dated 30 June 2020 noted above. The specific focus of the court's enquiry was the actual impact of the caveat in the final paragraph of the attachment to the Lithuanian Government's letter of 3 April 2020. The evidence before this court contains no direct reply to this letter. However the parties have presented their cases on the basis that there is an indirect reply, dated 19 August 2020, emanating from the Lithuanian Ministry of Justice. This is noted in [64] above. This states, in substance, that while there are continuing pandemic-related restrictions such as no contact with family members and others and limited availability of "programmes", this has not given rise to any reduction in the living space of prisoners. It is considered by this court that this was an adequate response. Notably the final two judgments of Belfast County Court contain no adverse assessment of this response.

[128] The guarantee, or assurance, of the Lithuanian Government dated 3 April 2020 applies fully to this appellant. It undertakes, in substance, that in the event of his surrender to Lithuania, he will be accommodated in one of the refurbished areas of the Siauliai Remand Prison in a cell with a minimum space allocation of three square metres. The related letter of 28 May 2020 indicates that the average cell space for detained persons in this prison is 5.6 square metres, excluding the WC.

[129] We turn to consider the most recent interaction between this court and the Lithuanian authorities. The response of the Lithuanian Government was received and shared with the appellant's legal representatives who made a brief further submission. The short to medium term consequences of this appellant's surrender to Lithuania will, as a matter of high probability, entail incarceration in a remand prison establishment. This was the impetus for many of the detailed series of questions addressed by the court to the Lithuanian authorities (reproduced in Appendix 4). In this way the requesting state was provided with the opportunity to furnish this court with information relating to the anticipated future course of events for this appellant. This court was neither seeking nor expecting, in reply, a concrete forecast of the future in the form of a detailed timeline. Rather the court was aware of the reality that, in whatever jurisdiction, in cases where a person is a (mere) suspect and a prosecution has not been initiated, there are unavoidable contingencies and imponderables. Thus a response framed in cautious terms and imbued with appropriate qualifications would have been unsurprising.

[130] However, in the event, the requesting state has provided a response which invites the following analysis. First, neither of the two responding agencies has adopted the format in which the court's questions were framed. Second, there is no specific engagement with any of the court's carefully composed 17 questions. Third, the Prosecutor General's Office has chosen to reply in the most general terms. The response simply states that:

“.... The criminal prosecution is pending ... it is expected to begin and complete his trial within the shortest possible terms from the moment the pre-trial actions with Mr Dusecivius are fulfilled and investigation is completed.”

Pausing at this juncture, there is a clear incompatibility between “criminal prosecution” and “investigation”. There is no indication of which of these processes applies to this appellant.

[131] The Prosecutor General’s Office reply continues:

“According to Lithuanian legislation a person who is suspected or accused of the commission of the criminal act is considered innocent until his guilt is proven”

Finally, it is stated that the offence (theft) for which this appellant is “sought” attracts a maximum punishment of 6 years imprisonment. The offence of “theft” is mentioned in the singular (“the offence”). There is no mention of the offence of criminal damage. Thus there is an ascertainable inconsistency between the terms of the EAW – see [9] above – and the aforementioned letter.

[132] The second of the two responding agencies is the Ministry of Justice/Prison Department. This letter contains the following passage (reproduced verbatim):

“In accordance to the data of Prison Department, the reason of issuing the European Arrest Warrant on Mr G Dusecivius was refusal to serve his sentence – 1 (one) year of imprisonment, imposed for by the judgement of Kaunas District Court of 18 December 2012. This means, that in case Mr G Dusecivius will be surrendered to Lithuania, he will need to serve his sentence in open colony.”

The “open colony regime” is explained in greater detail in the preceding paragraphs of the letter.

[133] This letter can only be described as bizarre, for the following reason. Upon the hearing of this appeal the court specifically enquired about the “conviction” EAW which existed in this appellant’s case, predating the “accusation” EAW with which this appeal and judgment are concerned. (See the chronology at Appendix 1.) The outcome of this enquiry was an agreed joint response of the parties which we reproduce:

“While Mr D had also been the subject of an earlier ‘conviction warrant’ dated 28 February 2014, following execution he served his sentence and this is of no enduring relevance, a formal discharge order of Belfast County Court having been ultimately made.”

In short, the information which the requesting state has, through its legal representatives, placed before this court regarding this issue is manifestly irreconcilable with what is stated in the recent Ministry of Justice letter.

[134] The court’s critique does not stop there. There is, rather, yet another incongruity. The unequivocal thrust of the recent letter from the Prosecutor General’s Office is that Mr D, in the event of his surrender, will have the status of a person subject to either “criminal prosecution” or “investigation”. The appeal before this court has been conducted bilaterally on the basis that, given the foregoing, this appellant will be detained as a remand prisoner if he is surrendered. The inconsistency with the Ministry of Justice’s letter is stark.

[135] The immediately preceding paragraphs disclose a situation upon which this court cannot but comment. This court’s proactive engagement with the authorities of the requesting state has generated information from the Lithuanian authorities which may be variously described as inadequate, evasive, contradictory, inconsistent and manifestly incomplete. This has unfolded in a context where, as the court has already commented, the responses of the Lithuanian authorities at earlier stages of this litigation saga were inadequate and unsatisfactory.

[136] The inadequacies of the response by the Lithuanian authorities to this court’s request for further information are thrown into sharp focus by our analysis of the Aronyosi and Dorobantu principles at [104] – [108]. As we have pointed out, at the first of the two stages contemplated by Aronyosi the court’s enquiry belongs to the general level, with a focus on detention conditions generally in the requesting state without specific reference to the circumstances of the requested person. This court’s request for further information was made at the second of the two Aronyosi stages. Thus it was based on the premise that there had been established a real risk of inhuman or degrading treatment by virtue of general conditions of detention in the requesting state. At the second stage, as already highlighted, the emphasis shifts from the general to the particular, entailing an intense focus on the person concerned. The Appendix 4 questions which this court transmitted to the requesting state were a reflection of this.

[137] This court could, in principle, transmit to the requesting state yet another request for further information. As rehearsed in [104] above, the test is whether this court considers all of the information now available to be sufficient to make its determination on surrender. The court has determined that no further request for information is appropriate. From the inception of these proceedings the requesting state has been afforded ample opportunity to provide the further information required by two successive courts. The terms of the requests have been clear and unambiguous. We take further into account that as the history of other cases considered in this judgment demonstrates, the Lithuanian authorities must by now be more than familiar with the Article 15(2) process. Our assessment is that the Lithuanian authorities are either unable or unwilling – or perhaps both – to provide the information which this court has requested. Thus to perpetuate this process at this stage would, in our view, be futile.

XIII OUR CONCLUSIONS

[138] Against the background detailed above, this court must now apply the test formulated by the ECtHR in Soering v United Kingdom [1989] 11 EHRR 439. There the court emphasised, inter alia, the absolute nature of the prohibition on torture and inhuman or degrading treatment, the fundamental character of this norm and the abhorrence with which democratic societies view such treatment: see [87] – [88]. At [90] the court highlighted the “serious and irreparable nature” of suffering inflicted in contravention of Article 3 ECHR. The court formulated the following test, at [91]:

“In sum, the decision by a Contracting State to extradite a fugitive may give rise to an issue under Article 3 and hence engage the responsibility of that State under the Convention, where substantial grounds have been shown for believing that the person concerned, if extradited, faces a real risk of being subjected to torture or to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment in the requesting country.”

[Our emphasis.]

It is appropriate to reproduce also the final sentence in this passage which is frequently overlooked:

“Insofar as any liability under the Convention is or may be incurred, it is liability incurred by the extraditing Contracting State by reason of its having taken action which has as a direct consequence the exposure of an individual to proscribed ill-treatment.”

[139] There is no suggestion that the authority of the Soering test has been questioned or undermined subsequently. It continues to apply with full vigour, while admittedly there are some cases in which the ECtHR has expressed itself in slightly different terms. For example, in Vilvarajah v United Kingdom [1991] 14 EHRR 248, the court's self-direction was in these terms, at [108]:

"The court's examination of the existence of a risk of ill-treatment in breach of Article 3 at the relevant time must necessarily be a rigorous one in view of the absolute character of this provision and the fact that it enshrines one of the fundamental values of the democratic societies making up the Council of Europe. It follows from the above principles that the examination of this issue in the present case must focus on the foreseeable consequences of the removal of the applicants to [their country of origin] ..."

[Here there is a footnote citing Soering.]

As the preceding passages make clear, there is a duty to consider all available evidence bearing on the application of the test.

[140] Similarly, in Saadi v Italy [2008] 24 BHRC 123 one finds at [130] the following formulation of the test:

"In order to determine whether there is a risk of ill-treatment the court must examine the foreseeable consequences of sending the applicant to the receiving country, bearing in mind the general situation there and his personal circumstances ..."

References to Soering are found in the footnotes to paragraphs [123] and [124].

[141] The specific and focused nature of the enquiry which the court must carry out at this stage finds further emphasis, in an EU law context, in ML (supra) where, in the parallel context of Article 4 of the Charter, the First Chamber of the CJEU stated that the requested state's enquiry must be directed to the place of detention where "... according to the information available to it, it is likely that the person will be detained, including on a temporary or transitional basis": see [117].

[142] This court considers that, while both the ECtHR and CJEU have not expressed themselves in uniform terms in the leading cases belonging to this sphere, the test which they have applied is in substance the same in every case and is referable to the Soering formulation, which continues to apply with full authority and without qualification. We shall proceed to examine the content of this test.

[143] Generally, we consider that the Soering test establishes a relatively elevated threshold, one that will not be easily overcome in any given case. A flimsy, trivial or technical risk of the kind required will plainly not suffice.

[144] Furthermore, a real risk is to be contrasted with one that is remote or fanciful. What is required of the court of the requested state in every case is an evaluative judgement, taking into account all of the evidence bearing on the application of the test. In this respect the evidence emanating from the authorities of the requesting state must be viewed in the round, considered as a whole. Furthermore, all material evidence must be examined applying the well-established principles of extradition law rehearsed above. This judicial exercise is to be contrasted with that of fact finding: the two are not the same.

[145] Thirdly, the Soering test requires of the court of the requested (or expelling) state an exercise in prediction. The court does not have a crystal ball. It is not required to be unerringly correct in its evaluation of foreseeable future events. The Soering test does not permit judicial resort to speculation. The foreseeable is neither the speculative nor the inevitable. Rather it lies somewhere between these two extremes on the notional spectrum. The judicial exercise in predictive evaluative judgment is undertaken in this gap.

[146] Fourthly, what is required of the court in every case will entail satisfying itself that it has sufficient information to perform its task and exercising its power under Article 15(3) of the Framework Decision where appropriate. Fifthly, the information on which the court's decision will be based must be material in the sense that it bears on the application of the test. Sixthly, the assessment which the court makes must, as a minimum, be a rational one, the product of assiduous and conscientious consideration infused by the expertise and experience of the chamber.

[147] This court has reflected on the question of how far it must cast its gaze into the future. This question did not arise with any force in the related appeal of Mr M as his factual framework was a simple one: being a convicted prisoner, he would in the event of surrender be transferred to prison accommodation designed for the population of convicted prisoners, with the minor qualification that (according to the Lithuanian evidence) he would be accommodated in remand detention facilities initially for a transient period measured in days.

[148] The case of this appellant, whose extradition is sought qua suspected offender, stands in contrast. The court's evaluation of the short to medium term foreseeable consequences of surrendering this appellant to Lithuania is straightforward. Having regard to all of the information available, the court has no reason to question the Lithuanian authorities' assurances relating to the prison conditions and facilities which will apply to this appellant for as long as he retains the status of remand prisoner. This will be his status immediately upon surrender and this status will continue for an immeasurable period thereafter. Those assurances adequately address all aspects of the appellant's Art 3 ECHR/ Art 4 CFR case.

[149] The more challenging issue is that the Soering test does not impose any time constraint on the future risk assessment to be performed by the court. If this appellant were, following surrender, to be prosecuted, convicted and punished by imprisonment, would his case in substance differ from that of Mr M? The answer would be "yes" only if this court, in its evaluative prediction of future events, were satisfied that all of the following consequences are foreseeable: the transition of this appellant from the status of mere suspect to that of an accused person (ie a prosecution materialises); an ensuing trial; the conviction of the appellant; a punishment entailing a sentence of imprisonment; an unsuccessful appeal if pursued; and the continuing unwillingness or inability of the Lithuanian authorities to provide relevant Article 3 compliance assurances - in a context where the terms of their communications make clear that this is designed to be a temporary state of affairs, driven by the Covid 19 pandemic which, of course, is an evolving phenomenon.

[150] This appeal can succeed only if the court is able to identify a real risk of exposure to Article 3 breaches based on substantial grounds. As our resume of future projections demonstrates, this appellant's future in the event of surrender to Lithuania is replete with imponderables. In his fact sensitive matrix, a real risk of suffering treatment proscribed by Article 3 ECHR/ Article 4 CFR, is dependent upon a series of inter-related possibilities eventuating. In summary, the appellant might be charged with criminal offences; he might stand trial; he might be convicted; he might consequentially be sentenced to imprisonment; he might pursue an unsuccessful appeal; and he might in further consequence be exposed to prison conditions infringing his Article 3 ECHR/Article 4 CFR rights. The equation in his case is made up of a multiplicity of "mights". Its hallmarks are remoteness and uncertainty.

[151] The contrast with the case of Mr M is instructive. Mr M will, as a matter of virtual certainty, be accommodated in a convicted prisoners' detention facility in respect whereof the requesting state has consistently and expressly refused to provide any human rights compliance guarantee. The linchpin of our decision in Mr M's case was that Lithuania, since April 2020, has unequivocally declined to provide any human rights compliance assurances relating to the prison accommodation conditions and facilities for the members of this cohort. The predictive evaluative judgment of the court in his case is framed in the terms “virtual” and not “absolute” certainty simply to accommodate the normal vicissitudes of life.

[152] In contrast, if surrendered to Lithuania this appellant, as a matter of high probability, will be accommodated in remand prisoners’ detention conditions in respect whereof appropriate human rights compliance assurances have been provided by the Lithuanian authorities and will remain thus accommodated for some considerable time. This applies to all aspects of his Art 3 ECHR case. On the specific issue of the risk of communicable diseases, the court is satisfied that it should give weight to the later Lithuanian evidence, postdating the AP, given the presumption of human rights compliance. Our acceptance of Lithuania’s human rights compliance assurances provides an effective answer to the other aspects of the appellant’s Art 3 case, summarised in [101] – [103] above. In our evaluative assessment of predictable future events it is not possible to be more dogmatic or precise.

[153] In the language of Soering, our conclusion in this fact sensitive case is that substantial grounds do not exist for believing that the appellant, if extradited, faces a real risk of being subjected to torture or to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment in Lithuania. While we have expressed substantial misgivings about the quality and adequacy of the information provided by the Lithuanian authorities in response to successive requests by the courts of this state, we are satisfied that these deficiencies, neither individually nor collectively, do not impel to a different conclusion. In short, they have no material bearing on how the Soering test is to be applied in the case of this appellant.

ORDER

[154] In the result we dismiss the appeal and affirm the decision of the first instance judge. If any ancillary or incidental issues are raised the court will deal with these separately having heard the parties.

POSTSCRIPT

[155] Following the delivery of this judgment on 24 June 2021, the court received an application on behalf of the appellant to certify a question of law of general public importance and grant leave to appeal to the United Kingdom Supreme Court. The question is framed in the following terms:

“Whether, for the purposes of the test identified in Soering v United Kingdom [1989] 11 EHRR 439, imprisonment following conviction is a foreseeable consequence of extradition on an 'accusation' warrant, such that there are substantial grounds for believing that a person so extradited faces a real risk of treatment contrary to Article 3 ECHR which has been found by the court to exist in convicted person's detention facilities in the requesting state."

[156] The Soering test is reproduced in [138] above. It requires the court to determine whether substantial grounds have been shown for believing that the person concerned, if extradited, faces a real risk of being subjected to torture or inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment in the requesting state. We consider this to be an intensely fact sensitive question. As our reasons for concluding that this test is not satisfied in the present case demonstrate, we have engaged in an acute focus on the particular facts and circumstances of the appellant's case. Fact sensitivity and predictive evaluative judgment combine to provide the determination of whether the test is satisfied in any given case. They are two stand features of the judicial exercise.

[157] The first part of the appellant's proposed question does not engage with either of the elements identified immediately above. It raises a fact sensitive issue in respect whereof the court will exercise its predictive evaluative judgment in every case. It relates not to the governing legal test, rather to its application in a given case. Thus it lacks the essential characteristics of a question of law, much less one of general public importance.

[158] Furthermore, the first part of the question is couched in terms which do not reflect the Soering test.

[159] The application must, therefore, be refused.